[6] There is no merit in appellant's contention that the transfer to him of one-twelfth of the capital stock of a corporation to manufacture and sell the briquette machines was a condition precedent to his obligation to convey the real property to the plaintiff. The first document above quoted does contain the following paragraph: "It is understood and agreed that should the owners of said Letters Patent later decide to form a corporation to finance the sale * * * of said mechanical device * * * the said John B. Dawson will * * * [convey] his interest in and to said Letters Patent * * * in consideration of the issuance to him of one-twelfth ($\frac{1}{12}$) of the total capital stock thereof." This transfer of interest in the letters patent to a corporation, in the event one should be organized, was clearly a conditional agreement dependent upon the subsequent organization of such a corporation. It in no way affected the defendant's obligation to convey the land to plaintiff as part consideration for the purchase of an undivided two-twentieths interest in the letters patent. There was no definite assurance that such a corporation would be organized. Neither the organization of the corporation to manufacture and market the machine, nor the issuance to the defendant of one-twelfth of the stock of such corporation, was a condition precedent to the maintenance of an action for specific performance of the agreement to convey the real estate.

[7, 8] The appellant asserts that the contract for exchange of properties is unjust and unfair, and that neither the pleadings nor evidence supports the court's findings to the effect that the consideration was adequate, and that the agreement was fair and reasonable. We think this contention is without merit. The second amended complaint alleges that the real property described in defendant's agreement to convey it "was at all the times * * * and is now, of the value of less than eight thousand dollars (\$8,000.00)"; that "the value of said undivided two-twentieths ($\frac{2}{20}$ ths) interest in said United States Letters Patent * * * is now, and was at the time of the execution of said agreement * * * the sum of ten thousand dollars (\$10,000.00); that said contract was, and is, fair, just and reasonable." This amounts to a specific declaration that the \$2,000 promissory note, plus the asserted value of the land, does not exceed the value of the conveyed interest in the patent rights, which is alleged to be worth \$10,000. No demurrer was filed to this second amended complaint. Moreover, the defendant deliberately accepted in writing both the first agreement to exchange properties and the assignment of the shares. The adequacy and fairness of the consideration is sufficiently alleged. It was an issue at the trial of the case, and any defect in the form of this allegation is waived by a failure to demur to the pleading and is cured by the findings and judgment of the court regarding that issue. In 23 California Jurisprudence, 495, § 52, it is said: "A defective allegation as to adequacy may be cured by findings and judgment for the plaintiff where the averments of the answer and the evidence offered at the trial show that both of the parties understood that that issue was presented."

On page 497 of the same authority last mentioned it is further said: "A failure to allege the value of the land may be excused * * * where the consideration agreed on has been accepted, the acceptance constituting a waiver of any claim of inadequacy."

[9, 10] The appellant has directed the court's attention to no evidence which refutes the court's specific findings that "the value of said undivided two-twentieths ($\frac{2}{20}$ ths) interest in said * * * Letters Patent * * * is now, and was at the time of the execution of said agreement * * * the sum of ten thousand dollars (\$10,000.00); that said contract was, and is, fair, just and reasonable," and that "The real property * * * is not now, and was not, at any of the times therein mentioned, * * * of any value in excess of \$2,365.00." The transcript of evidence consists of 930 pages. When the appellant fails to point out any evidence to the contrary, in support of a judgment, the appellate court will assume that the evidence amply supports the findings of the trial court. An appellate court is not bound to search the record for evidence to sustain a finding. 4 C. J. 677, § 2576; Davis v. Mene, 52 Cal. App. 368, 198 P. 840.

[11] The appellant contends that the contract may not be enforced for the reason that it lacks mutuality, in that the respondent cannot be required to transfer the patent rights on the records of the United States Patent Office. The contract does impose upon the plaintiff the obligation to "cause the same [transfer of interest] to be recorded and entered on the records of the United States Patent Office." The appellant may not complain on this account, for assuming that a state court lacked jurisdiction to compel such a transfer upon federal records, nevertheless we must assume that part of the transaction has been fulfilled. The complaint alleges: "On the 29th day of March, 1924, plaintiff caused said transfer and assignment to be recorded and entered on the records of the United States Patent Office." This allegation is not denied in the answer. Our attention is called to no evidence to the contrary. We must therefore assume the record amply supports the findings of the court to the effect that the transfer to the appellant was fully consummated.

[14] Regarding the appellant's charge that the contract was procured by means of fraud, several alleged false representations are specified. Chief among these are that (1) the plaintiff owned all patents which had been issued by the government for manufacturing briquettes, (2) the plaintiff's briquette machine was perfect, (3) he had expended $100,000 in perfecting the machine, (4) the machine could be manufactured at a cost of $1,600 and could be leased for $2,500 plus a royalty of 50 cents per ton for all briquettes manufactured. Other alleged false representations are specified which relate to the mistake regarding the proportion of the total number of shares of the patent rights which were to be transferred to the appellant, and to the contingent promise on the part of Dawson to accept one-twelfth of the capital stock of a corporation in the event of its organization. These latter charges involve a construction of the contract and have been heretofore disposed of. Findings were adopted by the court adverse to the appellant on all of these charges of fraud. We are of the opinion the record adequately supports each of these findings. There is a conflict of evidence as to some of these allegations of fraud.

On none of these issues has the appellant attempted to quote any evidence in support of his charges. He has sometimes made a general statement of the existence of evidence which he deems to be favorable, citing the transcript where such evidence may be found, leaving the court to search the pages of a voluminous record for contradictory evidence. By the aid of respondent and much labor this conflicting testimony has been discovered. We are satisfied these charges of fraud are captious and unfounded. Mr. Coleman testified regarding these alleged false statements: "Do you know how much these patents have cost you? * * * A. Yes sir. Q. How much, please? A. $121,700.67." Regarding the cost of manufacturing the machine, Mr. Humphrey, who operated the machine for the plaintiff in 1923, was called as a witness in behalf of the defendant and testified the machine was manufactured by the Fulton Iron Works in 1923 for $1,600. There is substantial evidence to support these statements which the plaintiff is alleged to have made. Moreover, the court found that the appellant did not wholly rely upon these statements, but made an independent investigation and watched the operation of the machine. There is evidence to support this finding. After watching the machine in operation the appellant declared he was satisfied with it and would buy the shares in the patent rights if the plaintiff would take his Porterville ranch in part payment therefor.

[15, 16] The alleged statements that the machine could be leased for $2,500 and royalties, and that it could be operated at a good profit, were mere expressions of opinion, and may not furnish the basis of an action for rescission. Assertions as to the value of property or the profit which may be earned in an enterprise are ordinarily classified as mere opinions of the owner. Rendell v. Scott, 70 Cal. 514, 11 P. 779; Lee v. McClelland, 120 Cal. 147, 52 P. 300; 12 R. C. L. 379, §§ 130, 131.

[17] In an effort to prove the allegation that the plaintiff claimed to hold all the patents which had been issued upon briquette manufacturing machines, he offered in evidence a certified copy of a patent to Emil Fernhold for an invention of a machine which he contends was designed for use for the same purpose. An objection to this offer was sustained on the ground that a proper foundation for its reception had not been laid. There was no preliminary showing as to the nature of the machine. There was no offer to establish such proof. Our attention is not called to any request to mark this certified patent for identification. We must presume that it is not a proper part of the record on appeal. We are therefore unable to determine whether it is in fact a machine similar in character to the one which is involved in this action. The objection must therefore be assumed to have been properly sustained. In 2 California Jurisprudence, 696, § 400, it is said: "The rule that errors in excluding evidence will not be considered unless the evidence excluded, or a showing of its materiality, appears in the record, is especially true of writings offered in evidence." Howard v. Howard, 67 Cal. App. 56, 69, 226 P. 984.

[18] It is asserted the court has allowed damages in excess of the amount claimed as rental during the time the land was wrongfully detained from the plaintiff. The complaint alleges that "the reasonable value of the use and occupation of said real property is the sum of one hundred dollars ($100.00) per annum. * * *" The prayer of the complaint asks for $200 damages for detention of the premises for the years of 1924, 1925, and "for such other sum as may accrue before the rendition of judgment." The court found that the defendant had received as rental for the premises the sum of $100 per year for the years of 1924, 1925, and 1926, during which time the land was wrongfully detained from the plaintiff, and that that sum was a reasonable value of the use of the property. The sum of $300 was thereupon awarded as damages on that account. This sum is supported by the pleadings and the evidence. The loss of rental for the year 1926 was an issue under the pleadings, and was properly allowed. Section 3283, Civ. Code. Section 580 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides in part: "The court may grant him [the plaintiff] any relief consistent with the case made by the complaint and embraced within the issue."

It was unnecessary to file a supplemental complaint to recover this rental. 21 Cal. Jur. 169, § 115.

The appellant has assigned 42 points as grounds for reversal. Many of them are interwoven and included within those essential points which have been heretofore disposed of. We are unable to find any merit in any of the assignments. We are convinced that a detailed discussion of the remaining points is not warranted.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

District Court of Appeal, Third District,
California.

Corporation had no legal authority to issue or deliver stock until permit therefor had been first secured from Corporation Commission (St. 1917, p. 675, § 3).

Corporation failing to secure authority to issue required amount of stock was not entitled to specific performance of agreement to convey interest in patent for stock (St. 1917, p. 675, § 3; Civ. Code, § 3386).

Agreement to transfer interest in patent for stock to be issued in corporation requires the issuance of 2,000 shares of capital stock to comply with offer of exchange out of a total number of 3,000 shares to be issued, while the permission for sale of stock granted by corporation commission was for sale of a total number of 5,000 shares, with right to transfer only 500 shares for patents, and that only after the previous sale and issuance of 500 shares at par for cash.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; F. C. Valentine, Judge.

Action by By-Products Fuel Machine Company against John B. Dawson. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Reversed.

Edward Winterer and Winterer & Ritchie, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Bordwell, Mathews & Wadsworth and Odell S. McConnell, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

Mr. Justice R. L. THOMPSON delivered the opinion of the court.

This is an appeal from a judgment enforcing specific performance of a contract to convey an undivided one-tenth interest in five patents in consideration of 250 shares of the capital stock of the corporation respondent. This action grows out of the same facts and was tried upon the same evidence which was adduced in the case entitled Coleman v. Daw- son, 294 P. 13, in which an opinion of this court was this day filed.

By the terms of a written contract the defendant agreed to purchase an undivided one-tenth interest in five patents on a briquette manufacturing machine for $10,000. The purchase price was represented by defendant's note for $2,000 and his 96-acre ranch near Porterville. The one-tenth interest in the patents was transferred to the defendant. He executed and delivered to Coleman his note for $2,000, but refused to convey the ranch. In an action for specific performance of the contract, a conveyance of the ranch was directed by the court to be made. In the Coleman v. Dawson Case, supra, this judgment was affirmed. The contract which was enforced in the last-mentioned case contained the following provision:

"It is understood and agreed that should the owners of said Letters Patent later decide to form a corporation to finance the sale and development of said Mechanical Device and Invention, the said John B. Dawson will join with the undersigned in transferring and conveying his interest in and to said Letters Patent and said Invention to said corporation, in consideration of the issuance to him of one-twelfth (1/12th) of the total capital stock thereof. * * *

"Dated this Tenth day of January, 1924.

"Robert B. Coleman.

"Accepted: John B. Dawson."

"The By-Products Fuel Manufacturing Company was duly incorporated with 3,000 shares of capital stock of the par value of $100 a share. Coleman was the original owner of the patent rights. He sold and transferred similar undivided interests therein to nine other individuals besides the appellant. He retained a large proportion of the interest in these patents and was the chief organizer of the corporation. All of the shareholders of the patents, including the appellant, joined in a written offer to transfer their respective interests therein to the respondent corporation in consideration for which shares of the capital stock of equivalent value were to be issued to them. This offer to transfer these interests in the patents contained the following language:

"We, the undersigned, subscribers to the capital stock of the By-Products Fuel Machine Company, do hereby offer to sell, assign and set over to your corporation, in full payment of Two Thousand (2000) shares, par value $200,000.00 of the capital stock, the following property, to-wit [describing the patents involved]. * * *

It required the issuing of 2,000 shares of the capital stock of the corporation to comply with the foregoing offer of exchange. Since the appellant was entitled to one-twelfth of the total number of 3,000 shares, his proportion would be 250 shares of the total value of $2,500. All of the shareholders in the patents actually conveyed their interests therein to the corporation, except the appellant. He refused to do so, claiming that his contract with Coleman for the purchase of one-tenth interest in the patent rights was procured by means of fraud and therefore void.

[1] The respondent had no legal authority to issue or deliver stock to the appellant until a permit therefor had been first secured from the corporation commission as required by the California Corporation Securities Act (St. 1917, pp. 673, 675, Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 3814, § 3).

April 7, 1924, the respondent corporation applied to the California Corporation Commission for a permit to sell 1,000 shares of the capital stock of the corporation for cash and to issue 2,000 additional shares in payment for the transferred interests in the patents. This petition named the eleven shareholders in the patents and the number of shares of capital stock in the corporation to which each would be entitled, aggregating a total of 2,000 shares. This included 250 shares to which the appellant would be entitled upon transferring his interest in the patents. The Corporation Commission granted this petition August 12, 1924, only in part and conditionally. The permit provided:

"By-Products Fuel Machine Company

"* * * is hereby authorized to sell and issue 1,000 shares of its capital stock as herein below set forth:

"1st: To sell and issue 500 shares of its capital stock at par, for cash. * * *

"2nd: Whenever and as often as shares are sold and issued under the preceding paragraph, to issue to the 11 persons named in its application, or any of them, a certificate * * * evidencing a like number of shares of its capital stock, not exceeding 500 shares under this permit, and an aggregate of 2,000 shares under this and any future permits, in full consideration for the transfer and assignment to applicant, first to be made, of the letters patent * * * clear of all liens, liabilities or encumbrances. * * *

"Applicant has an authorized capitalization of $500,000, divided into 5,000 shares of the par value of $100 each. * * *

"This permit is issued upon each of the following conditions:

"(a) That prior to the sale or issuance of any of said shares, said 11 persons named in the application shall:

"1st—Duly * * * assign and transfer to said company * * * [said] Letters Patent, * * * (a) Shall forthwith file the same for record in the United States Patent office; * * * (b) Shall file a duplicate of such instrument * * * with said Commissioner of Corporations.

"(b) That this permit shall not become effective for any purpose unless and until said 11 persons named in the application shall execute his or their agreement in writing with said company (and file a copy thereof with the Commissioner of Corporations) in which he or they shall, * * * agree * * * that in the event of the dissolution or insolvency of said company, occurring while said shares shall be so required to be held in escrow, the owners of such shares shall not, without the consent of said Commissioner, participate in any distribution of assets * * * until after the owners of all other securities shall have been paid the full face or par value thereof. * * *

"1. Each subscription for said shares shall be upon the express condition that unless bona fide subscriptions for 100 shares shall have been obtained from responsible subscribers, and there shall have been paid on account thereof the sum of $10,000 in cash, on or before the 15th day of February, 1925, such subscription may by such subscriber be, and thereupon shall be deemed to have been rescinded.

"2. * * * Otherwise, all rights of applicant to sell and issue shares under paragraph 1st hereof are suspended. * * *

"(f) * * * All certificates evidencing any of the shares authorized herein, in paragraph 2nd, to be issued shall be forthwith deposited with a depository, * * * to be held as an escrow pending the further order of said Commissioner * * * while said certificates shall be so held the holder of the shares evidenced thereby shall not sell, or offer for sale, or otherwise transfer, or agree to sell, or transfer, such shares, until the written consent of said Commissioner shall have been obtained so to do."

Under such circumstances the appellant refused to transfer to the corporation his interest in the patents. After notice, this action for specific performance was instituted. The court adopted findings favorable to the plaintiff on all essential issues, and thereupon directed the transfer to be made.

The appellant contends that specific performance will not lie in the present case for the reason that the contract to purchase the one-tenth interest in the patents is void on account of fraud and on account of all the other reasons assigned on appeal in the case of Coleman v. Dawson, supra. He also asserts that the findings and judgment in this case are not supported by the evidence chiefly for the specific reason that the issuing of shares of the corporation in payment for the appellant's interest in the patents was not authorized by the corporation commissioner, and that the plaintiff is therefore unable to perform its part of the contract.

The alleged invalidity of the contract to purchase the one-tenth interest in the patents is without merit for the reasons stated in the opinion of this court which was this day filed in the case of Coleman v. Dawson, supra.

[2] Specific performance of the agreement to convey to the plaintiff one-tenth interest in the patents will not lie under the circumstances of this case. The contract to transfer his interest in the patents is conditional upon the actual issuance to appellant of clear title to one-twelfth of all the capital stock of the corporation, free from any condition. The evidence seems uncontradicted that the respondent has never been in a position to issue and deliver to the appellant his share of the capital stock of the corporation free from conditions, or at all. The issuance of capital stock to be delivered to the shareholders of the patents in payment thereof was limited and restricted by the commissioner to numerous conditions. No shares could be issued for this purpose until a similar number of shares had first been sold to subscribers for cash. It was stipulated that: "No stock was sold * * * except the nine shares of stock to the original nine incorporators." Even upon this condition of first selling 500 shares for cash, only 500 other shares were actually authorized to be issued in payment for the transfer of the patent rights. Eleven owners of interests in these patents, including the appellant, were entitled to a total number of 2,000 shares of the capital stock. It may reasonably be assumed the commissioner's authorization to issue 500 shares for these patent owners was intended to be divided pro rata among them in proportion to their respective claims. The issuance of these shares was also conditioned upon the absolute assignment of the respective interests in the patents and a transfer of the title thereto "In the United States Patent Office." It was admitted at the trial this transfer of title was not registered in the United States Patent Office. The authorization to issue shares of capital stock was also conditioned upon the shares being placed in escrow for certain enumerated purposes and upon the execution of an agreement to this effect on the part of each of the eleven shareholders of the patents, copies of which agreements were to be filed with the corporation commissioner. These last-mentioned agreements were not executed or filed in compliance with this condition. The authorization to issue shares of the capital stock was also made subject to the payment of "all other securities" which were held against the corporation. From the first 500 shares authorized to be sold for cash, $10,000 was required to be paid before February 15, 1925, or the subscription for such shares was deemed to have been rescinded. No shares were sold for cash on or before that date, or at all, except the nine shares which were sold to the original incorporators. It is then provided by the terms of the authorization that, unless the net sum of $8,000 derived from the sale of shares for cash is deposited prior to February 15, 1925, subject to withdrawal by the corporation only upon the written consent of the corporation commissioner, then "all rights of applicant to sell and issue shares * * * are suspended." For noncompliance with this provision we assume that all authority to issue stock for any purpose was forfeited.

Moreover, it is recited in the conditional authorization to issue shares that "applicant has an authorized capitalization of $500,000, divided into 5,000 shares of the par value of $100 each."

The application for authorization to issue shares was not made on this basis. It was founded upon the assumption there were but 3,000 shares of the capital stock. If in fact the company was recapitalized for 5,000 shares, the appellant was entitled to one-twelfth thereof, or 416 $\frac{2}{3}$ shares. Therefore, an authorization to issue only 2,000 shares for payment to the patent owners with only 250 shares thereof to go to the appellant as his proportion would not comply with the terms of the agreement which entitled him to one-twelfth of all the shares.

From the foregoing, it is apparent the respondent was not authorized to issue or deliver to the appellant, free from entanglements and conditions, the shares of capital stock of the corporation to which he is entitled. The respondent could therefore not be compelled to perform his part of the agreement for the reason that he was unable to do so. This being true, specific performance of the same contract will not lie against the appellant.

Section 3386 of the Civil Code provides: "Neither party to an obligation can be compelled specifically to perform it, unless the other party thereto has performed, or is compellable specifically to perform, everything to which the former is entitled under the same obligation, either completely or nearly so, together with full compensation for any want of entire performance."

[3] To be entitled to specific performance, the party seeking this remedy must first substantially perform all the conditions precedent which are required by the terms of the contract. Section 3392, Civ. Code; 23 Cal. Jur. 453, § 23.

The judgment is reversed.

110 Cal. App. 381

PEOPLE v. LEWIS et al.
Cr. 1980.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 2, California.
Dec. 12, 1930.

1. Criminal law §404(4).

Revolver found in rear of house where defendant was arrested held properly received in robbery prosecution under circumstances.

Evidence showed that defendant at time of attempted arrest broke away from officer and ran into alley, and that officer thereafter saw some one go in the back door of defendant's home, warranting belief that revolver was thrown to the place where it was found by defendant as he made entrance into his house from the rear.

2. Criminal law §1167(4).

Filing of amended information setting up count theretofore dismissed on former trial held not prejudicial.

The record established that court of its own motion ordered count to be refiled after a new trial had been granted, and that district attorney thereafter confessed error, and together with counsel for defendant stipulated to facts establishing that plea of former jeopardy was well taken as to such count, and court not only instructed jury to return a verdict in favor of defendant on such count, but also during argument of counsel instructed them to disregard statements of district attorney that they could consider testimony of complaining witness on that count.

3. Criminal law §713.

District attorney's statement to jury that former jeopardy requiring dismissal of count was because of failure to obtain witness was not error.

Facts stipulated as furnishing evidence of former jeopardy in respect to certain count refiled in amended information contained motion of district attorney to dismiss on ground that process server had been unable to locate complaining witness, so that district attorney was well within his rights in stating to jury that jeopardy in such count was because of fact that one of witnesses was not obtainable after jury had been sworn.

4. Criminal law §1037(2).

Defendant failing to request trial judge to correct alleged error in respect to misconduct in argument could not complain on appeal.

5. Robbery §24(1).

Evidence held to sustain conviction for robbery.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Emmet H. Wilson, Judge.

Jesse D. Lewis was convicted of robbery, and he appeals.

Affirmed.

R. E. Parsons, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John D. Richer, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

IRA F. THOMPSON, J.

The defendant was charged by information, together with one Robert D. Whelchel, with two offenses of robbery. After the jury had been sworn and the trial commenced, the court on motion of the district attorney dismissed count I. The jury returned a verdict of guilty of the offense charged. The defendant Lewis was granted a new trial and Whelchel was sentenced to San Quentin. In the minutes of the court of March 10, 1930, we find this entry: "Motion for a new trial is argued and granted. The court orders count I of the information be refiled." In accordance with this order, an amended information was filed, charging the defendant with two counts of robbery, the first count being identical with count I in the information previously filed and which had been dismissed. During the second trial, and over the objection of the defendant, who had interposed the plea of former jeopardy, testimony was introduced identifying the defendant as one of two men who robbed the Richfield service station at Slauson and Avalon boulevard in Los Angeles of about $40 on the evening of January 2, 1930, at about 7 o'clock p. m., which was about one hour and forty-five minutes before another service station at Eighty-First street and Western avenue was robbed by two men identified as the defendant and Whelchel. No other witnesses were called whose testimony related exclusively to count I, and after the noon recess the deputy district attorney announced that he had examined the law during the recess and had concluded that the defendant had been placed in jeopardy on that count and was willing to stipulate that the jury should be instructed to return a verdict of former jeopardy as to count I. Thereupon the deputy district attorney and counsel for defendant stipulated to the facts showing that count I had been dismissed subsequent to the time the jury was sworn to try the case and that defendant had been rearraigned on the same charge and entered his plea of former jeopardy. This all took place in the presence of the jury, whereupon the judge said that at the proper time he would give the necessary instructions. He did so instruct the jury and they returned a verdict of former jeopardy as to count I and guilty of count II. This appeal is from the judgment pronounced upon the verdict of guilty and from an order denying appellant's motion for a new trial.

[1] The first assault upon the judgment is based upon the argument that the court erred in admitting into evidence a .32-caliber Colt automatic revolver, and we are therefore compelled to set down the testimony which is said by the respondent to furnish the foundation for its admission. The complaining witness as to the second count identified the appellant as one of the men who committed the offense and the one who held the gun. He testified when the revolver was exhibited to him in court that it was very similar to the one used and that he "would say it" was "the same gun." Two police officers testified that they were hidden out near the home of the appellant about fifteen minutes after the robbery when a Chrysler automobile drove up, from which Whelchel first alighted, to be followed in a few seconds by the appellant. When Officer Fountain attempted to arrest appellant, he resisted, finally escaping the first attempt to place him under restraint. This officer testified that when appellant fled he fired a couple of shots at him, at the second of which appellant apparently fell near an alley. He further swore that after turning Whelchel over to Lieutenant Stanger, he searched the alley for the appellant, but when he got back into the alley, directly behind appellant's home, he saw some one go in the back door; that he then came around front, and from the house next door telephoned for additional officers; that when he had finished telephoning he noticed Lewis "with about this much of his body in the open door of his home." After the other officers arrived and appellant was placed under arrest, they found the revolver which was received in evidence under a work bench in the rear of the house and near the garage.

It is apparent from the testimony we have recited that the jury were justified in believing from the testimony offered that the revolver was thrown to the place where it was found by the appellant as he made entrance into his house from the rear. Under such circumstances, and particularly with the identification of it by the complaining witness, the case of People v. Stoerkel, 87 Cal. App. 336, 262 P. 825, disposes of the argument. In that case the rule is announced which distinguishes the instant situation from the authorities upon which appellant relies.

[2-4] It is next sought to predicate error upon the asserted misconduct of the district attorney in filing the amended information setting up count I and introducing some testimony relevant thereto when, it is argued, that he must have known that the appellant had once been placed in jeopardy upon that charge. We can conceive of instances where the contention would be attended by more serious doubts than present themselves here. From all that appears in the record the court of its own motion ordered count I to be refiled. The district attorney frankly confessed error and together with counsel for defendant stipulated to the facts establishing that the plea of former jeopardy was well taken. The court not only instructed the jury to return a verdict in favor of the defendant on count I, but also during the argument of counsel instructed them to disregard the statement of the district attorney that they could consider the testimony of the complaining witness on that count "in the matter of identification," saying to them that the evidence given on count I would not be before them for any purpose. It is difficult for us to believe that in a case as free of complexities as the present one that appellant suffered any serious prejudice or damage. It is asserted, however, that the deputy district attorney should not have advised the jury in his argument that it was their duty to "find the defendant" had "once been put in jeopardy for that robbery, because of the fact that in making my motion to dismiss, because one of the witnesses was not obtainable, I made the motion after the jury was sworn." The appellant, of course, points to the words "because one of the witnesses was not obtainable" as being objectionable. However, the facts to which they stipulated as furnishing evidence of former jeopardy contained the motion of the district attorney to dismiss on the ground that the process server had been unable to locate Mr. Parker, who, we may add, was the complaining witness. It is obvious, therefore, that the district attorney was well within his rights. It is sufficient to say respecting the other assignments of misconduct that, if there was any overstepping of the legitimate bounds of argument at all, that it was of an insignificant character and at no time except in the instance already noticed did counsel ask the trial judge to correct the error or give him an opportunity to undo the harm it is now urged was done his client. Under such circumstances and under a well-known rule of law he is foreclosed of his contention before this tribunal.

[5] It is urged with a great deal of conviction that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict of the jury. We have already recited sufficient to indicate that the jury was justified in its finding. However, it is proper to add that it was testified that some money was found stuck down behind the seat of the automobile from which Whelchel and appellant were seen to alight; that appellant at the time of his arrest admitted in effect that he was the one who had scuffled and broken away from the officer a few minutes before. We cannot agree with appellant's contention.

No other points require discussion.

Civ. 7609.

District Court of Appeal, First District,
Division 2, California.
Dec. 19, 1930.

1. Husband and wife ⇨131(3).

Conveyance to husband and wife presumptively vested undivided one-half interest in wife as separate property (Civ. Code, § 164).

2. Husband and wife ⇨262(2).

Burden was on surviving husband to establish property conveyed to husband and wife was community property.

3. Husband and wife ⇨262(1).

To overcome presumption against community property, under circumstances, husband was required to show property conveyed to spouses was purchased with community funds, without intention by husband to make gift to wife.

4. Husband and wife ⇨264.

In proceeding to set apart probate homestead, evidence held not to establish property was community property.

Only testimony offered on such issue by petitioner to have the property set aside was to the effect that the property was acquired after marriage in the name of himself and his deceased wife and was paid for out of the earnings of both.

5. Homestead ⇨140.

Decedent's interest being separate property, rather than community property, surviving husband was not entitled to have property set aside to him absolutely, but only for limited period (Code Civ. Proc. § 1468).

SPENCE, J.

This is an appeal from an order setting apart a probate homestead.

The appellant, as the surviving husband of decedent, petitioned for an order setting apart as a probate homestead certain property alleged by petitioner to be community property of petitioner and decedent. The court found that said property was not community property, but that petitioner and decedent were the owners of said property as tenants in common. It was ordered that the property be set aside to the petitioner as a homestead "for a limited period, to-wit: the period of ten (10) years from the date of this order, and that said property so set apart shall belong one-half thereof to said Ottavio Simonini, the surviving husband of said decedent, and one-half thereof to the estate of Antoinetta Simonini, the said decedent, in equal shares."

[1-5] Appellant contends that the court erred in setting apart the homestead for a limited period only. He claims that the uncontroverted evidence shows that the property was community property and not separate property and that it should have been set apart to him absolutely. We find no merit in this contention. On the hearing the only testimony offered by petitioner on this issue was to the effect that the property was acquired after marriage in the name of himself and his deceased wife and was paid for out of the earnings of both. The conveyance presumptively vested an undivided one-half interest in the wife as her separate property. Civ. Code, § 164; Gilmour v. North Pasadena Land & Water Co., 178 Cal. 6, 171 P. 1066; Pabst v. Shearer, 172 Cal. 239, 156 P. 466. The rule is well established by the foregoing cases that the burden was upon the husband to establish that the property was community property. In order to overcome the presumption, it was not only necessary to show that the property was purchased with community funds, but in addition it was necessary to show that there was no intention on the part of the husband to make a gift to the wife. This petitioner failed to do, and the court properly found that the property was not community property. The interest of the decedent being in the nature of separate property rather than community property, petitioner was not entitled to have the property set apart to him absolutely but only for a limited period. Code Civ. Proc. § 1468.

On the hearing of the petition respondents offered no evidence except the judgment roll in a previous action, which judgment roll was admitted. In that action appellant had sought to quiet title against respondents to the property involved and judgment had been rendered in favor of respondents and against appellant. In view of our conclusion that appellant was not entitled to have said property set apart absolutely but only for a limited period as ordered by the court, we deem it unnecessary to discuss the effect of this judgment upon the rights of appellant in this proceeding.

The order is affirmed.

HOUSER, J.

Defendants appeal from a judgment rendered against them in an action wherein they were charged with liability as stockholders of a corporation.

It appears that the corporation of which defendants were stockholders was indebted to the plaintiff in approximately the sum of $90,000, and that said corporation, together with several other corporations, were being "merged" into a new corporation by a procedure which included the taking over by the new corporation of the assets of each of the old corporations and the assumption by the new corporation of the liabilities of each of the old corporations; to be followed by an issuance of a certificate of stock by the new corporation to each of the old corporations in proper proportionate amounts. The plan of consolidation also included the purchase for cash of additional stock in the new corporation by each of the old corporations. To that end, the corporation of which the defendants were stockholders made arrangements with the plaintiff to borrow money from it with which to purchase stock in the new corporation amounting to the sum of $68,000. In the late afternoon of the same day on which the $68,000 was paid by the plaintiff on behalf of the old corporation for the additional stock purchased by it, the indebtedness of $90,000 theretofore owed by it to the plaintiff was paid by the new corporation.

For a reversal of the judgment, it is first urged by appellants that, since as to them (as stockholders), at the time the action was commenced, the statute of limitations had run on the $90,000 indebtedness owed by the old corporation to the plaintiff, for the reason that the entire transaction hereinbefore outlined amounted merely to a discharge in part of that indebtedness and a renewal thereof as to the balance of such obligation, the statute also had run as against the latter debt.

[1, 2] It is a rule of law, established by the weight of authority, that the benefits which may result to a defendant from the provisions of statutes of limitations are available only by means of an affirmative defense interposed by him; and that, especially when dependent upon facts not appearing in the complaint or introduced in evidence by the plaintiff, the burden of establishing the facts constituting such a defense rests on the defendant. Pierce v. Southern Pacific Co., 120 Cal. 156, 162, 47 P. 874, 52 P. 302, 40 L. R. A. 350; San Diego Realty Co. v. Hill, 168 Cal. 637, 639, 143 P. 1021; Wise v. Williams, 72 Cal. 544, 548, 14 P. 204; Wright v. Ward, 65 Cal. 525, 527, 4 P. 534; Strauss v. Canty, 169 Cal. 101, 145 P. 1012; Van Buskirk v. Kuhns, 164 Cal. 472, 129 P. 587, 44 L. R. A. (N. S.) 710, Ann. Cas. 1914B, 932; Farrell v. Palmer, 36 Cal. 187; Black v. Vermont Marble Co., 1 Cal. App. 718, 82 P. 1060; 16 Cal. Jur. 626; 37 C. J. 1243; 17 R. C. L. 1004.

With reference to the facts in the instant case appertaining to the defense of the statute of limitations, the finding by the trial court was: " * * * That none of the notes mentioned or described in the plaintiff's complaint was made, executed or delivered for the purpose of evidencing or extending any pre-existing indebtedness of said (old corporation) to the plaintiff."

Although the direct evidence in support of such finding is not particularly strong, when certain ambiguous circumstances which are capable of being construed in favor of the finding, together with the legal principle that on the defendants rested the burden of establishing the necessary facts, are also taken into consideration, it is concluded that the requirement of sufficiency of the evidence to support the finding is satisfied.

[3] It is further contended by appellants that, because of what might appear to be an inconsistency between the finding to which reference has been had and another finding made by the trial court, it follows that the findings as a whole do not support the judgment. The particular language of the finding to which attention is directed is that: " * * * Nor did said plaintiff agree to release the (old corporation) from any liability on account of any indebtedness theretofore existing between the plaintiff and the said (old corporation) to any extent whatsoever."

In making the loan of the total sum of $68,000, the plan followed was that it was divided into several different amounts for each of several of which a promissory note was executed by the old corporation in favor of the plaintiff and a like promissory note for the same amount was executed by some individual in favor of the old corporation, and which latter promissory note was then indorsed by the old corporation and delivered to the plaintiff as collateral security for said principal note. The complaint herein, although founded upon the liability of the stockholders for the entire indebtedness of $68,000, to a considerable extent was made up of separate counts relating to each of the several principal promissory notes which were so executed; and the separate defense of one of the defendants, as expressed in his answer to the complaint, among other things, contained the allegation: "That defendants are informed and believe and upon such information and belief allege that the promissory note set forth in said complaint was given by the said B. Houssels to the International Packing Corporation of California, a corporation, upon the understanding and agreement between the said B. Houssels, the plaintiff herein, and the International Packing Corporation of California, a corporation, that the said promissory note was for the amount of the stockholders' liability owed by the said B. Houssels on account of stock held by him in said International Packing Corporation of California, a corporation; that said plaintiff agreed to release the International Packing Corporation of California, a corporation, from all liability on account of any indebtedness theretofore existing between the plaintiff and the said International Packing Corporation of California, a corporation, to the amount of said promissory note of the said B. Houssels, to-wit: in the sum of two thousand and four hundred dollars ($2,400)."

By a comparison between the language employed in the finding in question and the special defense to which reference has just been had, it will be noted that said finding is in direct response to said defense. Although the latter part only of the finding is the subject of criticism by appellants, an examination of the finding as a whole discloses the fact that it simply negatives the allegation contained in such special defense to the effect that the collateral or individual promissory note to which reference was had in the complaint was executed with the understanding that it was "for the amount of any stockholders' liability," or that, by reason of the giving of such promissory note, the plaintiff agreed to release the old corporation from any portion of any liability arising on account of former indebtedness theretofore existing between the plaintiff and the old corporation. Thus explained, no inconsistency is apparent between the two findings to which attention has been directed.

[4] Appellants further urge that the complaint failed to state a cause of action, in that it contained no allegation that either of the promissory notes indorsed by the old corporation was ever presented for payment, or, indeed, as a prerequisite to the bringing of an action upon an indorsed negotiable instrument, that either or any of the several acts incumbent upon the drawee or holder of such an instrument had been performed.

The only reply necessary to such contention is that the action was on the liability of stockholders arising out of the total new indebtedness of the old corporation to the plaintiff, as evidenced by the corresponding notes of the old corporation to the plaintiff. Although each of the several collateral notes was set forth in the complaint, the entire action was not brought on the assumption by the plaintiff that each of the several defendants was liable to the plaintiff by reason of his having executed that promissory note. Those notes were but incidental or evidentiary of the cause of action stated in the complaint. Each of them was taken as collateral security for the particular sum of money represented by the principal promissory note. Its injection into the action merely showed, or tended to show, a part of the details which made up the ultimate transaction on which the liability of the stockholders depended, and furnished some evidence of an item contained in the total indebtedness for which the action was brought. Consequently it was wholly unnecessary that the complaint contain an allegation either with reference to whether the collateral promissory notes were or either of them was ever presented for payment, or as to either of the other ordinary requirements in an action against an indorser of a promissory note.

The judgment is affirmed.

STURTEVANT, J.

Late at night on the 26th day of November, 1926, Helen G. Munns was killed in an automobile collision. Later this plaintiff was granted letters of administration and commenced this action against the defendant to recover damages in favor of the heirs of the deceased. The defendant answered and a trial was had before the trial court sitting with a jury. The jury brought in a verdict in the sum of $151. From a judgment entered thereon the plaintiff has appealed and has brought up typewritten transcripts.

[1-3] In her brief the plaintiff contends that the trial court erred in instructing the jury on the subject of damages. Among others the court gave an instruction as follows: "The court instructs the jury that the plaintiff can not recover more than $150, plus nominal damages, and nominal damages have been spoken of as a trifling sum such as one cent, a few cents, or a dollar." If that instruction was properly given, the judgment should be affirmed. Otherwise it should be reversed. In this connection the defendant contends that the evidence in the record showed that no one of the heirs of the decedent nor all of them were entitled to recover anything, that is, that the evidence showed affirmatively that no one of the heirs suffered any pecuniary loss by reason of the death of Mrs. Munns. The decedent was survived by her mother, Mrs. Olga Bunk, who resides at Council Bluffs in the state of Iowa, and so far as the record discloses has never been in California. The decedent was also survived by her husband. In her brief the plaintiff argues that the record shows that at least the mother and husband were entitled to relief in a sum larger than that awarded by the verdict. The record does not show when Helen G. Munns ceased to live with her own family, but it does show that as early as June 29, 1921, she was at Tulsa in the state of Oklahoma, and that while there she and William G. Munns intermarried. No member of the Bunk family was called as a witness. William G. Munns, the surviving husband, was called as a witness and made many conflicting statements as to when he got married and during what time or times he and his wife lived together as man and wife. The evidence is not contradicted to the effect that from February to August, 1926, the husband was in jail and that presumably during that time he and his wife were living separate and apart. In August, the husband left Los Angeles for Inyo county and later went to San Diego county. There is no evidence that after he left they lived together. He testified that for eight hours he and his wife were together during the last Saturday in August, 1926. That testimony was flatly contradicted by a witness who testified that during the month of August Mrs. Munns was not in Los Angeles at all. The husband testified that the last time he and his wife kept house together was in December, 1925, but the record does not show whether that housekeeping was for the period of one day or longer. Mrs. Richards testified that for eighteen months prior to the death of the decedent the latter lived with Mrs. Richards and that during that time the decedent did not communicate with her husband nor with any other member of her family; and that during said period of time Mrs. Munns engaged an attorney to commence an action to obtain a divorce. Mrs. Richards further testified that during the time Mrs. Munns was with her, Mrs. Richards supported her. There was evidence that at times the decedent earned $25 per week, but there is no evidence that at any time she made any contributions toward the support of any one of her kith or kin or that she received any assistance from any one of them. About the time Mr. and Mrs. Munns intermarried, they went to Council Bluffs and there saw Mrs. Bunk. They never saw her afterwards, and the evidence does not show that any communications of any kind or nature passed between the decedent and her mother or other members of the family. An undertaker was engaged by Mrs. Zuelke, a bystander. His bill for burying the decedent was $308; but there was no evidence that any one of the family contracted for said sum. After it had been incurred the decedent's mother paid $150 to the undertaker. In the case of Bond v. United Railroads, 159 Cal. 270, 113 P. 366, 48 L. R. A. (N. S.) 687, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 50, the Supreme Court entered upon a long discussion as to the elements and the amount of damage in this class of cases. At page 285 of 159 Cal., 113 P. 366, 372, the court said: "With regard to the danger of excessive verdicts from this rule, we can only say that the remedy is practically committed entirely to the judge who presides at the trial in the court below. If he does his duty, he will carefully weigh the evidence himself, and will not allow a verdict to stand for its full amount if he believes it gives more damages than the pecuniary loss that it may be reasonably supposed the plaintiff will actually suffer by being deprived of the services, earnings, society, comfort, and protection of the child." The duty so cast on the trial judge may properly be exercised either before the jury retires or later on an application to grant a new trial. Where, as here, there is no substantial conflict in the evidence regarding the intimacy of the relations existing between a decedent and her heirs, the trial court is at liberty to weigh the evidence and direct the verdict in accordance with the opinion so formed by the trial judge. In Estate of Sharon, 179 Cal. 447, at page 459, 177 P. 283, 288, the court said: "It is a settled rule of law regarding trials by jury that in a proper case the court has full power to direct the jury to render a verdict. This power exists in favor of the defendant where there is no substantial evidence tending to prove all the controverted facts necessary to establish the plaintiff's case. It is not necessary that there should be an absence of conflict in the evidence. To deprive the court of the right to exercise this power, if there be a conflict, it must be a substantial one. There are numerous decisions to this effect." (Citing them.) In the case of Spencer v. San Francisco Brick Co., 5 Cal. App. 126, 89 P. 851, it was held that as there was no evidence to justify an award of punitive damages, the trial court erred in refusing to give an instruction to that effect; and thereafter, when a motion for a new trial was made, that the court also erred in denying the motion. No good reason appears why the trial court should allow the jury to bring in an excessive verdict and then put the parties to the trouble and expense of presenting a motion for a new trial. As stated by the court in Bond v. United Railroads, supra, it was the duty of the trial judge to "carefully weigh the evidence himself." In support of the judgment we must assume that he did so. Certainly there is nothing in the record to show that he abused his discretion in so weighing the evidence.

We find no error in the record.

The judgment is affirmed.

Plaintiffs, husband and wife, brought this action for personal injuries to the wife, for medical expenses incurred, and property damage all growing out of the collision of defendant's and plaintiffs' automobiles on the 20th day of December, 1927. The court awarded judgment to plaintiffs in the sum of $960 for the injuries to the wife, medical expenses incurred by her, and for damage to their automobile. From this judgment defendant appeals.

Appellant's contentions are substantially that there was a misjoinder of parties plaintiff, and that there were two causes of action not separately stated. These same contentions were embodied by him in a demurrer in the lower court, which was overruled.

The case of Farrar v. Whipple, 65 Cal. App. 123, 223 P. 80, is squarely in point, and we see no reason which compels us to depart from the rule there announced. In that case the defendants appealed from a judgment entered against them for damages arising out of personal injuries to the plaintiff Josephine Farrar and for damages to the automobile of the husband.

On page 126 (of 65 Cal. App., 223 P. 80, 81) of the report the court says: "It is argued that an action for damages to personal property of the husband cannot be joined with an action for damages for personal injuries sustained by the wife alone. Subdivision 8 of section 427 of the Code of Civil Procedure is cited. This reads in part that in any action brought by the husband and wife all consequential damages suffered or sustained by the husband alone may be alleged and recovered without separately stating them, and 'that causes of action for injuries to person and injuries to property, growing out of the same tort, may be joined in the same complaint, and it is not required that they be stated separately.' By the terms of the section the husband may be joined with his wife in suing for consequential damages resulting from personal injuries sustained by the wife alone. His action then becomes an action for damages for personal injuries, and as such is within the terms of that portion of the section which has just been quoted and which authorizes the joinder of an action for injuries to person and property growing out of the same tort." See, also, Meek v. Pacific Electric Ry. Co., 175 Cal. 53, 164 P. 1117; Fassett v. Nascimiento (Cal. App.) 291 P. 269.

The construction given to section 427 in Farrar v. Whipple, supra, is conclusive upon the appellant here.

This is an appeal from a judgment sentencing appellant for the crime of robbery and from an order denying his motion for a new trial. Heretofore, the appellant wrote to one of his attorneys directing him to dismiss the appeal because it was his "belief that" he "could not receive a fair and impartial consideration" of his case. We declined to dismiss the appeal on the basis of that letter because it assumed as its premise a belief unworthy of notice. Emanating from another source, we should be bound to take a different view relative thereto, but coming as it does from one whom we may suppose is suffering from remorse for the crime of which he has been convicted, we sympathize with it as the pitiful outburst of a tortured soul.

Appellant's counsel say that they have examined the transcript with great care, both with respect to the trial upon the plea of not guilty and also with respect to the plea of not guilty by reason of insanity, and are convinced that he had a fair and impartial trial upon both; that the evidence is ample to establish the offense and also the sanity of the appellant. The Attorney General's office agrees with this state of the record.

Inasmuch as no points are raised, nothing remains for us to consider.

Action by Edith Babcock against W. E. Jewell, M. E. Jewell and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants named appeal. Affirmed.

John C. Miles, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

HOUSER, J.

Plaintiff brought an action to recover from defendants alleged usurious interest and penalty for the exaction thereof. The original complaint contained the allegation that the defendants "did take and receive from the plaintiff herein the sum of three hundred seventy-two and 09/100 dollars ($372.09) for the loan by defendants to plaintiff of the sum of twelve hundred eighty-eight dollars ($1288.) in money for six (6) months, which said loan the plaintiff did fully repay. * * * " Later, an amended complaint was filed by which it was charged that the amount received by defendants was $6,172 for a loan made by defendants to plaintiff of the sum of $4,500 for six months. Judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiff in the sum of $2,557.71.

Among other defenses to the amended complaint, defendants Jewell alleged:

"That the transaction set forth in plaintiff's complaint is an entirely different transaction from that set forth in plaintiff's original complaint; that the transactions between the plaintiff and defendant were separate, distinct transactions involving separate and distinct purchases of trust deeds at a fixed and definite discount. * * *

"That several causes of action have been improperly united in said complaint which does not appear upon the face of said complaint but that nevertheless said alleged cause of action set forth in plaintiff's complaint includes three separate transactions all of which are barred by section 3 of that certain initiative measure adopted by the people at a general election on November 5, 1918, and designated and known as the 'Usury Law of the State of California,' for the reason that more than one year has expired since the payment of any of said obligations and the filing of said amended complaint."

With reference to the facts upon which such defense was founded, the trial court found "that all the allegations of the answer (except certain facts not here material) are untrue."

The only point expressly made by appellants in their opening brief is that the trial court erred in determining that plaintiff's alleged cause of action was not barred by the statute of limitations. However, the point upon which the applicability of the statute turns, and which is argued by respective counsel, is whether, considering the complaint as charging assumpsit as for money had and received in a certain amount, plaintiff had the right to so amend the complaint as to charge defendants with having received a different amount and thereby increase the claim for damages.

Adverting to the language employed, first, in the original complaint, and, secondly, in the amended complaint, it will be noted that, in the former, defendants were alleged to have received the sum of $372.09 for a loan of $1,288; while in the latter, it was alleged that defendants received the sum of $6,172 for a loan of $4,500. As far as is disclosed by the respective pleadings, nothing appears which clearly indicates that the cause of action set up in the one complaint is not identical with that set up in the other. In each of them, apparently, a loan of a definite amount of money constituted the transaction from which arose the claim for the usurious charge against defendants. No language is used which would indicate that the money lent or the interest collected represented more than a single transaction. To the contrary, the words to the effect that defendants received a certain sum of money "for the loan" by defendants to plaintiff of another specified amount, "which said loan the plaintiff did fully repay," would afford a basis for the presumption that but one possible cause of action could have arisen from the dealings between or among the several parties by reason of the facts to which reference was had in the complaint.

By the provisions of the so-called "Usury Law" (St. 1919, p. lxxxiii), the right to maintain an action of the character of that here involved is limited in time to one year after the accrual of the cause of action.

[1,2] The authorities are harmonious to the effect that an amendment to a complaint which sets up a new cause of action may affect the defendant as of the date of its filing only, and does not relate back to the date of the filing of the original complaint. Hogarty v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co., 255 Pa. 236, 99 A. 741, 8 A. L. R. 1405; 37 C. J. 1074. But if the complaint herein, as amended, related solely to the identical cause of action set forth in the original complaint, the fact that by the amendment the amount of damages claimed was increased, would present no tenable legal objection. 5 C. J. 1400; 2 R. C. L. 764, and authorities there cited.

[3] As hereinbefore stated, the findings by the trial court, which were amply sustained by the evidence introduced on the trial of the action, are to the effect that the affirmative allegations contained in the answer of the defendants relating to whether the amended complaint set up a different cause of action from that embraced in the original complaint, were untrue; which statement includes a denial by the trial court of the truth, not only of the allegation contained in the answer that the transaction set forth in the original complaint was different from that stated in the amended complaint, but as well, a further denial of the additional allegation in said answer "that the transactions between the plaintiff and defendant were separate, distinct transactions, involving separate and distinct purchases of trust deeds. * * *". From a consideration of such findings, it follows that the execution of the three promissory notes constituted but a single transaction, and that the amended complaint related solely to the identical cause of action set forth in the original complaint. The action having been commenced within the period permitted by the terms of the statute, the defense interposed by the defendants to the effect that the statute had run as against the cause of action cannot be sustained.

The judgment is affirmed.

HENDERSON v. RIGGLES.

Civ. 6088.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 1, California.

Dec. 9, 1930.

1. Executors and administrators ⇐97.

Administratrix, though unauthorized to bind estate without court's consent, could personally employ accountant to perform services for her having relation to estate.

2. Executors and administrators ⇐97.

That contract employing accountant was entered into by administratrix because of fear of litigation and by advice of then counsel did not affect validity of contract.

3. Executors and administrators ⇐97.

Finding of facts authorized accountant to recover compensation due him under terms of agreement with administratrix personally.

Findings stated that administratrix had paid to accountant a certain sum, which was less than amount accrued under contract, that no services were performed by accountant under contract subsequent to April, 1926, that prior to such date estate had been reduced to cash, that formal closing of estate alone remained to be done, and that there were no services required under agreement, but that accountant was ready to perform the contract, which provided that employment should continue up to entry of final decree of distribution.

Action by A. P. Henderson against Emma Riggles, commenced in a municipal court. Judgment for defendant was reversed by the superior court, and defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

Chambers & Lyman, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Kelby & Lawson and Clyde C. Triplett, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J.

The defendant, while acting as the duly appointed administratrix of a decedent's estate, entered into a written contract with the plaintiff employing the plaintiff as accountant, adviser, and financial agent to assist her in the business affairs of said estate; said employment to continue up to the entry of final decree of distribution of the estate at a salary of $100 per month. The action was brought against the defendant individually to recover the unpaid portion of plaintiff's compensation under said agreement, which had accrued prior to final distribution of the estate.

The action was brought in the municipal court of the city of Los Angeles, where judgment was entered in favor of the defendant. On appeal to the superior court the judgment was reversed. The present appeal is by the defendant from the judgment of the superior court.

The appeal to the superior court was presented on the judgment roll. The findings of fact made by the municipal court were in substance as follows: That said contract was entered into by the defendant by reason of fear of litigation and by the advice of her then counsel; that the defendant has paid to the plaintiff a certain sum (which sum is less than the amount accrued under the terms of the contract), and that the said sum so paid fully compensated the plaintiff for all the services rendered by him by reason of said contract; that no services were performed by the plaintiff under said contract subsequent to the month of April, 1926; that prior to April, 1926, said estate had been reduced to cash and the formal closing of the estate alone remained to be done and there were no services required under said agreement; that plaintiff was ready and willing at all times to perform all things to be done by him under said contract. Nevertheless, the municipal court held that the defendant was not indebted to the plaintiff in any sum whatever and accordingly entered judgment in favor of the defendant.

[1] The contract, although signed "Emma Riggles, Administratrix of the estate of Henrietta Adams, deceased," was her personal contract. While the administratrix was not authorized to bind the estate upon such a contract without first obtaining consent of the court in which the administration was pending, she did have the right personally to employ the plaintiff to perform services for her having relation to the conservation of the estate and the performance of labor necessary for the benefit of the estate. England v. Winslow, 196 Cal. 260, 265, 266, 237 P. 542. 11 Cal. Jur. p. 1048.

[2, 3] On the face of the findings of fact the plaintiff was entitled to recover the compensation due him under the terms of the agreement. The mere fact that the contract was entered into by the defendant "by reason of fear of litigation and by the advice of her then counsel" does not affect the validity of the contract. Under the plain terms of the contract the salary agreed upon had accrued prior to the commencement of the action. The facts as found did not support the conclusions of law or the judgment of the municipal court. The superior court was right in reversing that judgment.

The judgment of the superior court is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yolo County; W. A. Anderson, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Emilie V. Bemmerly, deceased. Action by Frederick B. Abele and another, by Adolph Abele, their guardian, against Mary E. Abele, executrix, and others, to revoke the probate of a certain writing as the last will and testament of deceased. Judgment for the proponents, and the contestants appeal.

Affirmed.

Huston, Huston & Huston, of Woodland, for appellants.

PLUMMER, J.

This is an appeal by the above-named contestants from a judgment of the superior court in favor of the respondents based upon a directed verdict.

On the 25th day of August, 1928, Emilie V. Bemmerly, a resident of Yolo county, died in the city of Berkeley. On the 17th day of September, 1928, an order was made by the superior court of Yolo county admitting to probate a certain writing as the last will and testament of said deceased. On the 10th day of September, 1929, the appellants began an action to contest the admission of said writing to probate as the last will and testament of said deceased, and prayed judgment of the superior court revoking the probate thereof. Paragraph VI of the contest filed by the appellants reads as follows: "That at the time when said purported last will and testament was executed, the deceased was incompetent to make a last will and testament, and was not of sound and disposing mind or memory." It appears from the record that the cause was tried upon the issue of the soundness of mind of the testatrix. While the testimony set forth in the transcript appears to be practically overwhelming in support of the writing as the last will and testament of Emily V. Bemmerly, and of her soundness of mind at the time of its execution, nevertheless, in view of the fact that the court directed the verdict, we will confine ourselves first to a consideration of the testimony introduced by the contestants, and that portion thereof which the contestants claim warranted sending the cause to the jury undirected, and will later give a general summary of the whole case.

[1, 2] Both contestants and respondents concede the law to be that the right of the court to direct a verdict is absolutely the same as the right of the court to grant a nonsuit, and that a nonsuit may only be granted, when disregarding conflicting evidence and giving to the contestants' evidence all the value to which it is legally entitled, indulging in every legitimate inference which may be drawn therefrom, the result is a determination that there is no evidence of sufficient substantiality to support a verdict in favor of the contestants, if such a verdict were returned. Following this statement, we will set forth what the contestants claim to be the substantial testimony of Adolph Abele, the father of the contestants and the guardian of the contestants in this action. This witness testified that in 1915 he married Miss Emilie V. Bemmerly, the daughter of the deceased. The issue of that marriage was a boy and girl, who appear as contestants herein; that Emilie V. Bemmerly died April 12, 1924; that whatever unfriendly relations had existed between the witness and Emilie V. Bemmerly, deceased, had all been smoothed out in 1924; that the witness had not remarried since the death of his wife Emilie; that the two children, the issue of said marriage, had frequently visited the deceased prior to her last illness; that the deceased was first taken to Providence Hospital some time during the month of June; that about a month before her death, the deceased was removed to the home of Mrs. Williams in Berkeley; that about the 1st of August, 1928, the witness visited the deceased at the home of Mrs. Williams, and had some conversation with her about a $150 check; that the next time the witness visited Mrs. Bemmerly was on August 14, 1928; that he arrived at the home of Mrs. Williams at about 3:30 p. m. What the evidence shows is best indicated by quoting the questions and answers:

"Q. In what condition did you find Mrs. Bemmerly at that time, as compared with the first of August? A. Very bad.

"Q. Well, just tell the jury what? A. Well, when I came in there she was all nervous and she wanted to go home, but she never spoke; she just said, 'I want to go home. I want to go home.' And Mrs. Williams said, 'Adolph is here.' And she said, 'I want to go home;' and her eyes were all bleary and never noticed me at all.

"Q. Did she call you by name? A. No.

"Q. And so far as you could tell she did not recognize you? A. No, she did not recognize me.

"Q. And did she carry on any conversation with you? A. No, sir.

"Q. And was she sitting up in bed? A. Yes.

"Q. And how long were you there on this last time on August 14th? A. Well, Mrs. Williams got—told me to stay there until she got some of that there—they called it morphine at that time, but I heard afterwards it was strychnine.

"Q. Well, you don't know what it was she got, Mr. Abele? A. No; and then she quieted down and I went out.

"Q. Did you go in and see her again on the 14th? A. That evening, yes.

"Q. At what time in the evening? A. Oh, it must have been about 8 o'clock, I guess, right before bedtime.

"Q. And what was her condition then? A. Well, she was asleep there and I didn't say anything.

"Q. Did you have any conversation with her? A. No, sir.

"Q. She was simply asleep and nothing transpired? A. That is it.

"Q. Now, did you see her on the morning of the 15th? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. At about what time in the morning? A. Oh, it must have been about 8 o'clock, 8 or 9 o'clock.

"Q. Was she awake? A. She was awake; she was kind of moaning all the time.

"Q. And did she speak to you or recognize you? A. No.

"Q. Did you try to talk to her? A. Yes.

"Q. Did she answer you? A. No.

"Q. Did she give any indication of knowing that you were in the room? A. No.

"Q. Now, how long were you in the room on the morning of the 15th? A. Maybe five or ten minutes.

"Q. Did you see her again on the 15th? A. About 8 o'clock.

"Q. And what was her condition at that time? A. She did not know me.

"Q. The same as it was on the other visit? A. On the 14th, yes.

"Q. Did you see her on the 16th? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. About what time in the morning? A. I saw her about 9 o'clock.

"Q. When you left in the afternoon of the 16th about 3:30, did you see Mrs. Bemmerly? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. How long were you in the room? A. I was in there for five minutes.

"Q. And did you try to talk to her? A. There was not use; she was asleep.

"Q. Now, I will ask you, Mr. Abele, whether or not, on these occasions that you have mentioned, on the 14th, 15th and 16th, and the 19th and 20th, Mrs. Bemmerly was, in your opinion, a person of sound or unsound mind? A. Unsound mind."

The testimony as to the 19th and 20th shows that the deceased was apparently asleep at the times when the witness was in her room. The testimony of this witness, as set out in the transcript, was repeated several times, but what we have stated is all that the testimony shows, and the direct and cross-examination, though it covered the ground several times, affected no material change.

Preceding the introduction of the testimony of this witness, the contestants placed upon the stand other witnesses whose testimony did not relate to the mental condition of the deceased, and then offered the deposition of Mrs. Amelia Abele Williams, a niece of the testatrix, a professional nurse, and who acted as nurse for the deceased during her last illness. This witness testified that Mrs. Bemmerly was taken to the Providence Hospital some time in June, 1928, and left the hospital on or about July 19, 1928; that she was brought to the home of the witness and remained there until the time of her death; that she was brought there in a taxi; that for about a week after the deceased came to the home of the witness, deceased was up and around. About a week after the arrival of Mrs. Bemmerly from the hospital the doctor ordered her to bed, and that thereafter she remained in bed until the time of her death; that the deceased was suffering from heart trouble; that the attacks would last not longer than half an hour; that the deceased was given digitalis, a heart stimulant, and in the evening, one-eighth of a grain of morphine, as a sleeping potion; also, that the deceased was given cremo carbonates, a medicine for the stomach; that the morphine was administered nightly in order to induce sleep; the dose was usually given about midnight; the digitalis was administered about every four hours; that the digitalis did not have any effect save and except to stimulate heart action; that the deceased was able to feed herself until a few days before her death; that the deceased had orders to remain quiet; that they kept the deceased in a sitting position in bed; that the deceased read the newspapers, including the home papers, up until a few days preceding her death; that the deceased gradually became physically weaker; that there was a marked change two or three days before her death, which took place on the 25th day of August, 1928. This witness also testified that Mrs. Bemmerly asked that a priest be called, and that a priest called on the 13th, and again on a later date. The witness also testified that Mrs. Bemmerly desired to be taken to her home in Woodland, and that on the evening of the 13th she called up Adolph Abele upon the phone, and that he came to the home of the witness on the 14th of August. The witness then described an attack which the deceased suffered on the 14th, and the testimony continued as follows:

"Q. And what about the severity of that attack as compared with previous attacks? A. That was about the same.

"Q. Well, how did it leave her? A. It left her—when the doctor called that morning, I forget now whether the 14th or the 15th—he warned us and advised us that he would not guarantee her heart to stand the trip to Woodland.

"Q. Now, returning to the 14th, the day that she had the attack, after you received the telephone from Adolph, how long did that attack last? A. Just about the same period—a slight attack.

"Q. And did you administer any morphine during that attack? A. That was in the morning; no, I didn't.

"Q. Then, as I understand you, according to your recollection she had no opiate between the night of the 13th and the night of the 14th? A. Only at night; only at her bedtime.

"Q. Now, you were there when Adolph arrived? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And did Adolph go in the room and see her after he arrived? A. Yes.

"Q. Were you in the room at any time Adolph Abele and your aunt, Mrs. Bemmerly, the three of you together? A. Well, I can't recall, but we must have been together because I was the nurse.

"Q. Do you know what your aunt's condition was at the time Adolph arrived, with reference to being conscious or unconscious? A. She was conscious.

"Q. What was her condition with reference to being weak? A. She was weak.

"Q. Was she asleep when he arrived? A. I don't remember.

"Q. Do you know whether or not she recognized him when he arrived? A. I don't remember, but she must have; she was conscious.

"Q. Have you any recollection of being in the room with your aunt on the 14th, at the time Mr. Adolph Abele was present? A. I do not.

"Q. How many times did Mr. Abele see her on the 14th? A. I don't remember.

"Q. What was her condition on the night of the 14th, when you administered the morphine? A. Her usual condition.

"Q. Did Adolph spend the night in your home? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Now, on the 15th, what was your aunt's condition? A. She was very bright.

"Q. Did you have any conversation with your aunt in the presence of Adolph, about going to Woodlawn? A. I don't recall.

"Q. Do you recall any conversation you had in the presence of your aunt, when Adolph Abele and yourself were present on the 15th? A. I do not recall any conversation.

"Q. And your aunt was better on the morning of the 15th? A. I did not say 'better'; I said 'bright.'

"Q. What was the difference in her condition with reference to brightness, when she was in one of those attacks. A. She was exhausted-like."

This witness further testified that up until three days before the death of the deceased, she was rational, and that her mind was all right; that her physical condition was getting weaker.

The witness Bertha Keehn testified that she went to the room of Mrs. Bemmerly on the 19th of August, and that at the time she went to the room Mrs. Bemmerly was asleep; that no conversation was had with Mrs. Bemmerly on account of the fact that she was sleeping.

The facts as disclosed by the record are substantially as follows: That the testatrix was taken ill on or about the 10th day of June, 1928. In about a week thereafter she was taken to the Providence hospital at Oakland, and remained there until the 19th of July, when her condition being much improved, she was brought to the home of Mrs. Williams at Berkeley; that Mrs. Bemmerly was up and around the house at this place for about one week, when she suffered a relapse and was ordered to her bed. She remained in bed from that time until her death, which occurred on August 25, 1928. Heart attacks continued at irregular intervals until the time of her death, lasting from half an hour to 45 minutes. She was kept, most of the time, in a sitting position. The deceased was given digitalis every four hours, and one-eighth of a grain of morphine every evening. During the time Mrs. Bemmerly remained at Berkeley she was nursed by Mrs. Williams, a graduate nurse. After being ordered to bed, there was no material change in the condition of Mrs. Bemmerly until about the 19th of August. The deceased did not lose consciousness at any time until three days before her death. The deceased received visitors, read her home papers, and was able to converse with her relatives who called upon her. On the 13th of August, she asked to see a priest, who called upon her that day. On the 13th she asked to be taken to her home in Woodland, and Adolph Abele was telephoned to come and take her. Adolph Abele arrived at the Williams' home about 3 o'clock in the afternoon of August 14th. Mrs. Bemmerly was nervous and said she wanted to go home; did not say anything else except that she wanted to go home. While Adolph Abele was present on the afternoon of the 14th, Mrs. Williams administered to the testatrix a hypodermic of digitalis; the testatrix then quieted down. Abele did not see her any more that day until just before bedtime, about 8 o'clock. The testatrix was asleep, and Adolph Abele had no conversation with her. He saw her again on the morning of the 15th, about 8 o'clock, for five or ten minutes; she was awake and moaning; did not speak to, or recognize him. Abele saw her for five or ten minutes on the night of August 15th, at which time she was asleep, and he did not disturb her. Abele saw her again on August 16th, in the morning; the deceased was asleep at that time. On the morning of the 16th, after Adolph Abele had departed from Oakland, the testatrix asked Mrs. Williams to tell Mrs. Abele to get some papers and a pencil and come up to her room, as she wanted to make a will. This request was complied with. When Mrs. Abele arrived at the bedside of the testatrix, she informed testatrix that she could not do anything without a lawyer, and asked her if she would like to have Mr. Gaddis, who was then believed to be at San Rafael. The testatrix replied that she would like to have him. An attempt was made to communicate with Mr. Gaddis. In the meantime the testatrix requested Mrs. Abele to take down on some paper, items with regard to her property. The testatrix indicated her real property and certain bequests that she wished to be made. Mrs. Abele made this memoranda at about noontime on August 16th. At about noontime Dr. Cheney arrived, and communication not having been made with Mr. Gaddis, Dr. Cheney arranged to have Mr. Sutcliffe call at the Williams' home. Mr. Sutcliffe arrived at about 4 o'clock in the afternoon of August 16th. Mr. Sutcliffe was introduced to the testatrix, discussed the items with the testatrix, contained in the memorandum made by Mrs. Abele, got the boundaries of her lands from the testatrix, and discussed with her her personal property, and the bequests she desired to make. Mr. Sutcliffe then drew up a will in lead pencil, which was executed by the testatrix and witnessed by Mrs. Abele and himself. Mr. Sutcliffe then stated that he would take the will with him and put it in typewritten form and return the next day and have it executed in typewritten form. Mr. Sutcliffe returned with the typewritten will on the 17th, and the typewritten will was then executed.

[3, 4] During the time we have covered by the testimony, it appears that the deceased had one or two attacks of what the witnesses called "hysterics." In addition, a great deal of testimony appears in the transcript, as we have stated, showing the competency of the testatrix, and the soundness of her mind at the time of the execution of the will on the 17th of August. There is no testimony tending to show that the testatrix was not, on the 17th of August, 1928, conscious, nor any testimony tending to show that she did not fully understand what she was doing, and the disposition she was making of her property.

The contestants further asserted that the will admitted to probate is unnatural, and in support of this contention, make the following statement: "By the terms of the will she divided a tract of land in Yolo county consisting of 120 acres, by devising 80 acres to her grandchildren, and 40 acres to the two nieces mentioned. After making cash bequests aggregating $2,100, the residuum of the estate was equally divided between the two grandchildren and these same two nieces. Thus the share of the estate taken by the grandchildren only exceeds that of the nieces to the extent of 40 acres of land. According to the value of the land as fixed by the appraisal, these grandchildren received only $10,000.00 more than the nieces. The evidence is silent as to any reason why the testatrix so preferred and favored the two nieces." And in support of their contention, the contestants introduced in evidence a will which was executed by the deceased on September 4, 1924, and thereafter destroyed. We think this will in itself is a sufficient answer to the claim of unnaturalness. In the third clause of the will of 1924 we find the following: "I declare that my two grandchildren named Frederick Bemmerly Abele and Mary Elizabeth Abele having received their share of their mother's estate in land, at the time of her death, I do now give, devise and bequeath to them, in equal shares, share and share alike, all moneys and property belonging to me at the time of my death, not herein otherwise disposed of and not disposed of by and through the deeds of gift above referred to."

In the same will, the cousins, Christ Gumbinger and Charles Schnery, were bequeathed a promissory note which was owed by them to the deceased. To Bertha Mary Keehn was bequeathed all the contents of her residence, including furniture, carpets, etc. In the second paragraph of the will the deceased declared that at the date of making the same, she made, executed and delivered into the custody of E. E. Gaddis deeds of gift of all her real estate, with directions to deliver the same to the grantees named therein upon her death. This instrument shows that the testatrix did not, in 1924, at a time when there was no question made as to her competence, intend that the contestants in this action should receive all of her estate. The record does not show to whom the deeds were executed. The will under consideration gives 80 acres of land to the two grandchildren, 40 acres of land to two nieces, and among the bequests $300 is given to Christ Gumbinger and $300 to John Gumbinger, persons who are named in the will of 1924; and then, in the residuary clause, the estate was to be divided between Frederick Bemmerly Abele, a grandson, and Mary Elizabeth Abele, a granddaughter, the contestants herein, and Bertha Abele Keehn and Amelia Abele Williams, nieces.

It appears that the deceased had other nieces who were unmentioned in the will of 1924, and also were unmentioned in the will under consideration.

No attempt is made in this case to prove any hallucinations or delusions on the part of the deceased, or anything in the record indicating undue influence or influence of any kind whatsoever. The law is well settled in this state that a "testator of sound mind and disposing mind and memory, if, at the time of making his will he has sufficient mental capacity to be able to understand the nature of the act he is doing, and to understand and recall the nature and situation of his property, and to remember and understand his relations to the persons who have claims upon his bounty, and whose interests are affected by the provisions of the instrument."

The testimony of Adolph Abele that he visited the room of the testatrix three times while the testatrix was asleep, once when she was drowsy and another time when the testatrix was suffering from a heart attack, moaning and saying she wanted to go home, is in fact, when analyzed, no evidence whatever of unsoundness of mind, and the witness' opinion of the unsoundness of mind of the testatrix, based upon such premises, does not rise to the dignity of what is called a "scintilla" of evidence. To hold that such testimony is sufficient upon which to set aside the execution of a solemn instrument would be tantamount to the repealing of the probate law relating to the execution of wills. The two wills, executed four years apart, show that the testatrix had in mind the contestants in this action, and that she never intended to give them all of her property, as shown by the instrument introduced in evidence by the contestants.

Upon the record it is clear that had the cause been submitted to the jury, and the jury returned a verdict in favor of contestants, it would have been the duty of the trial court to set such verdict aside, and upon the long list of cases contained in the California Reports, if such verdict had not been set aside, it would be the duty of an appellate court so to do.

An analysis of the cases having to do with will contests would add nothing to the legal literature of this state which has not already been fully covered. For this reason we content ourselves with the foregoing summary of the facts.

Finding nothing in the record which would justify a verdict in favor of the contestants, it follows that the judgment of the trial court must be, and the same is hereby affirmed.

All concur.

PINEGAR v. McGEE.

Civ. 4327.

District Court of Appeal, Third District,
California.

Dec. 15, 1930.

1. Wills ☞571.

By terms of will giving war risk insurance policy with specified file number, testator sufficiently identified and specifically bequeathed such policy and its proceeds, requiring distribution thereof to legatee's estate, rather than estate of testator.

2. Wills ☞753.

Where testator, by terms of will, bequeaths certain insurance policy, legacy is specific in its nature.

3. Wills ☞439.

Will must be construed according to testator's intention.

Appeal from Superior Court, Amador County; C. P. Vicini, Judge.

After a supplemental inventory was filed by Ralph McGee, executor of the estate of Ernest M. Mattley, deceased, accounting for the receipt of the proceeds of a war risk insurance policy, a supplemental decree of distribution was made over the objection of Milton L. Pinegar, administrator of the estate of Pearl E. Pinegar, deceased, and from such decree, the administrator appeals.

Reversed with directions.

W. R. Barnes, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

A. L. Pierovich, of Jackson, for respondent.

R. L. THOMPSON, J.

This is an appeal from a supplemental decree of distribution.

Ernest M. Mattley was a World War veteran. He died September 11, 1926, leaving an estate consisting of about $11,000. He also possessed an adjusted compensation insurance policy with the government of the United States of the value of $1,561, and a separate war risk insurance policy of $10,000 with the government, in which his sister, Pearl Pinegar, was named as beneficiary. Upon proceedings duly had, his holographic will was admitted to probate in Amador county. The respondent Ralph McGee was appointed and qualified as executor thereof. The will is in the following language:

"4417 East 3rd. Street
"Los Angeles, Calif.
"August 28, 1926.

"This is my last will.

"To Alice Mattley, I give $100.—To Florence Mattley, I give $100.—To Corinne Mattley, I give $100—my diamond ring and my portable typewriter.

"To my brother George E. Mattley I leave my Adjusted Compensated Insurance Policy number 1765429. My share of the cabin.

"To my sister Mrs. Pearl Mattley Pinegar, I give my War Risk Insurance File number I 182941.

"The remainder shall be divided to my sister Mrs. Pearl Mattley Pinegar $\frac{5}{8}$ to my brother George E. Mattley $\frac{3}{8}$.

"Ralph McGee is appointed administrator.

"Ernest M. Mattley
"Ernest M. Mattley"

In due course of administration distribution of the $11,000 was made on April 15, 1927. The executor was not discharged. Neither the proceeds of the adjusted compensation policy, nor the war risk insurance policy were included in the inventory or distributed in the original decree of distribution. Regarding this omission the respondent, in his brief, says:

"The respondent as executor did not include either the War Risk Insurance payable to Pearl nor the bonus insurance payable to George in any of the proceedings of the estate."

The adjusted compensation insurance amounting to \$1,561 was paid by the government directly to George E. Mattley. During her lifetime Pearl Pinegar, as beneficiary, was paid by the government the monthly installments of \$56.63 as provided by the terms of the war risk insurance policy. She died at Los Angeles, January 26, 1929. Upon proceedings duly had, the appellant, Milton L. Pinegar, was appointed administrator of her estate. At the time of the death of Pearl Pinegar, there remained unpaid upon the war risk insurance policy the sum of \$6,802.67. This sum was paid to the executor of the estate of Ernest M. Mattley subsequent to the rendering of the original decree of distribution. The respondent assumes that this sum belongs to the estate of Ernest M. Mattley subject to administration. He thereupon filed a supplemental inventory October 29, 1929, accounting for the receipt of "Proceeds of War Risk Insurance policy, No. I 182941, \$6,802.67." This was the same policy which, by the terms of the will, was bequeathed to Pearl Pinegar. A supplemental petition for distribution of this sum of money was filed. Over the written objection of the administrator of the estate of Pearl Pinegar, deceased, a supplemental decree of distribution of this balance of the war risk insurance fund was made pursuant to the residuary clause of the will as follows, to "Pearl E. Pinegar, a sister, $\frac{5}{8}$ thereof," and to "George E. Mattley, a brother, $\frac{3}{8}$ thereof." From this supplemental decree of distribution, the administrator of the estate of Pearl Pinegar has appealed.

[1] Assuming, as the respondent does, that this fund from the war risk insurance policy belonged to the estate of Ernest M. Mattley, it was specifically bequeathed to Pearl Mattley Pinegar by the unambiguous terms of the will. By the language of the will, "To my sister Mrs. Pearl Mattley Pinegar, I give my War Risk Insurance File number I 182941," the testator sufficiently identified and specifically bequeathed to his sister that particular policy and the proceeds therefrom. In 28 R. C. L. 295, § 269, it is said:

"[2] "Where, by the terms of a will, the testator bequeaths a certain insurance policy or policies, * * * the legacy is specific in its nature." 2 Page on Wills (2d Ed.) 2043, § 1228; 6 A. L. R. 1374, note.

[3] A will must be construed in accordance with the intention of the testator.

There can be no question this was the intention of the testator. The balance of the proceeds from that policy did not belong to the residuum of the estate. The court therefore erred in distributing four-ninths of this fund to George E. Mattley.

The supplemental decree of distribution is therefore reversed, and the probate court is directed to distribute the entire balance of the war risk insurance policy number I 182941 to the estate of Pearl Mattley Pinegar, deceased.

All concur.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; T. H. Selvage, Judge.

Action by Joseph Rosella against Spiros Paxinos and others, doing business under the name and style of the Classic Grill, and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and Spiros Paxinos appeals.

Affirmed.

Frank J. Fontes, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Trefts & Young, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

The defendant Spiros Paxinos owned and operated a restaurant on the northeast corner of Third and Stevenson streets in San Francisco. He also maintained a stairway leading from the sidewalk on Stevenson street to the basement of the building. This stairway was parallel with the south wall of the building, the entrance thereto being from the west toward Third street. The opening was covered by two iron gratings which were fastened to the sidewalk on the south side of the entrance by means of hinges. When the gratings were raised, they were kept upright by means of bars extending across the opening to eyelets in the wall of the building. Across the east end of the opening from the easterly grating to the wall it was intended that another bar, which some of the witnesses described as a gate, should be kept in place. The purpose of this was to afford additional support to the upright gratings and protection to persons using the street.

On December 13, 1927, at about 7:30 p. m. the plaintiff, who was walking west along the north side of Stevenson street, fell through the easterly end of the opening into the basement of the building and was injured. The complaint alleged that the injuries were due to the fact that defendant negligently left the opening unguarded. The answer denied the alleged negligence, and averred contributory negligence as a defense to the action. The court found in accordance with the complaint and against the averments of the answer. Defendant has appealed from the judgment entered against him, and contends that the findings are not supported by the evidence.

Plaintiff testified that he had been employed in selling newspapers in the vicinity of the restaurant since 1906. These he obtained from a newspaper office on Stevenson street. The night of the accident was dark and foggy, and it was testified by other witnesses that at night the opening could not be seen further away than five or six feet. A witness employed in a cigar store on the same corner also testified that he had frequently closed the bar or gate in order to prevent accidents. Plaintiff admitted that he had observed the stairway and gratings on many occasions. On the evening of the accident, after obtaining his papers, he walked west along Stevenson street, but failed to see that the stairway was open, and fell in. He testified that there was no bar in place across the same on this occasion. According to a physician, in addition to receiving bruises from the fall, he was injured in the region of the coccyx bone, which at the time of the trial in May, 1929, was still extremely sensitive. The plaintiff and other members of his family testified that he had been unable to work since the accident, and that his income from his employment had been about $100 per month.

[1-3] As defendant points out, portions of plaintiff's testimony were contradictory, and in many particulars his recollection of events was uncertain, and his testimony that the bar or gate was not in place at the time of the accident was opposed by that of defendant and other witnesses. Nevertheless, the credibility of these witnesses and the weight to be given their testimony were questions for the trial court. We cannot say that plaintiff's testimony was inherently improbable, and, notwithstanding the contradictions therein, the conclusions of that court cannot be disturbed on appeal. Pedrow v. Federoff, 77 Cal. App. 164, 247 P. 212.

[4, 5] It was alleged and proved at the trial that the city and county of San Francisco had previous to the accident adopted an ordinance regulating the operation and construction of trapdoors and other openings in sidewalks. The ordinance provided, among other things, that all sides of such openings must be guarded by chains or bars, and also that it should be unlawful to keep the bars, openings, or gratings thereof open except during the time necessary for the receiving or shipping of merchandise or supplies, and unless during the time the same remained open suitable guards or railings were provided to prevent accidents to the public. The violation of such an ordinance, if it proximately caused the damage complained of, was negligence, and this question was also one for the determination of the trial court. 19 Cal. Jur. Negligence, § 65, p. 632; Benjamin v. Noonan, 207 Cal. 279, 277 P. 1045.

[6-11] It is also claimed that plaintiff's knowledge of the existence of the stairway, together with his failure to observe its condition on the night of the accident, will bar a recovery. It has been held in several cases that, if a person knows of a dangerous defect in a sidewalk, he is bound at his peril to remember it. Davis v. California St. Cable R. Co., 105 Cal. 131, 38 P. 647; McGraw v. Friend, etc., Lumber Co., 120 Cal. 574, 52 P. 1004; Reynolds v. Los Angeles Gas, etc., Co., 162 Cal. 327, 122 P. 962, 39 L. R. A. (N. S.) 896, Ann. Cas. 1913D, 34. The defendant and another witness testified that the trapdoor was always left open. There was no admission of this condition by the plaintiff; and whether it was true presented another question of fact. If the testimony was untrue, then the plaintiff, though he knew of the existence of the stairway, would have no reason to anticipate that the same would be left in a dangerous condition or that the ordinance would be violated. One who is himself not negligent is entitled to rely upon the presumption that others will exercise due care, so that it is not negligence to fail to anticipate danger which can come only from a violation of law or duty on the part of another. 19 Cal. Jur. Negligence, § 35, p. 596; Harris v. Johnson, 174 Cal. 55, 161 P. 1155, L. R. A. 1917C, 477, Ann. Cas. 1918E, 560. Moreover, late cases hold that forgetfulness of a known danger will not always operate to prevent a recovery, for to forget is not negligence, unless it shows want of ordinary care, the question being one for the jury. Meindersee v. Meyers, 188 Cal. 498, 205 P. 1078; Smith v. Southern Pacific Co., 201 Cal. 57, 255 P. 500; Hayward v. Downer, 65 Cal. App. 450, 224 P. 265. The above questions, which involved the weight to be given the testimony of witnesses, were properly for the jury or the court sitting as a jury, and we cannot say that its conclusions were unsupported.

Finally, it is urged that the damages awarded are excessive. While the evidence on this question presents some conflict, there was sufficient, if believed by the court, to justify the award, and the findings are fairly supported by the evidence.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Edward T. Bishop, Judge.

Action by G. A. Malmstedt against F. A. Stillwell. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

Robert E. Austin and John N. Helmick, both of Los Angeles, and J. E. Stillwell, of South Pasadena, for appellant.

W. C. Shelton, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

This action was brought by plaintiff, as assignor of W. I. Hollingsworth and B. O. Miller, copartners doing business under the firm name of W. I. Hollingsworth & Co., to recover a broker's commission. The assignors were at all the times herein mentioned duly licensed real estate brokers. The case was tried by the court, which found for the plaintiff, and judgment was entered accordingly.

Defendant, who has appealed, claims that certain of the findings are unsupported and that the court erred in its conclusions of law therefrom.

The facts established by the evidence were as follows: In September of 1921, J. P. Simonsen and J. A. Fleming, who owned the Fountain Cafeteria in Los Angeles, wished to purchase another cafeteria. This fact was known to the brokers, who were endeavoring to procure one for the prospective buyers. Defendant and A. L. Plotner, his partner, owned and operated the Poinsettia Cafeteria, which was for sale. Knowing this, the brokers commenced negotiations with defendant for the purchase of the business, but refused to disclose the names of the prospective buyers until defendant promised to pay a commission in case of sale. This he agreed to do, and on September 28, 1921, signed and delivered to the brokers the following letter, referred to in the record as "plaintiff's exhibit 1":

"Gentlemen:—In the event a sale is consummated with your prospective tenant we hereby agree to pay you $2,000.00, a commission on the sale price of same.

"Yours very truly, F. A. Stillwell."

At the same time defendant executed to the brokers a document referred to as "plaintiff's exhibit 2," which read as follows:

"Gentlemen:—For and in consideration of your service we hereby give you an exclusive option for forty-eight (48) hours to sell the Poinsettia Cafeteria and lease, including everything in use in it, and all broken packages, for $50,000,—$30,000 cash, and balance on or before six months from date of sale at the rate of 7% interest.

"Yours very truly, F. A. Stillwell."

On September 30, 1921, defendant and his partner wrote thereon the following:

"9/30 this contract is to be nolle and void after 3:30 p. m. on 9/30.

"F. A. Stillwell,
"A. L. Plotner."

The testimony shows that the figures 9/30 were intended to mean September 30. On the date last mentioned, according to the testimony, the following—which will be herein-after considered—was also written thereon by Simonsen, one of the owners of the Fountain Cafeteria:

"Accepted 9/30/21, 3 p. m. Contract to be drawn for the sale of the above.

"Fountain Cafeteria,
"By J. P. Simonsen, Prop."

On September 28 the brokers called on the owners of the Fountain Cafeteria, and showed them the above Exhibit No. 2. They thereupon offered in writing to purchase the Poinsettia Cafeteria for $45,000, of which $25,000, including a deposit of $1,000 made at the time, was to be paid in cash and the balance on or before six months from the date the buyers should obtain possession. This writing—which was referred to as "plaintiff's exhibit No. 3"—was as follows:

"Received of Fountain Cafeteria check for $1,000, being a deposit and part payment of the purchase price of the Poinsettia Cafeteria, located at 441 South Hill street. The purchase price of said cafeteria as is, including all broken packages, to be $45,000.00 payable $25,000.00 cash upon delivery of possession, including the above deposit, on or before October 15th, and balance on or before six months from date of possession, at the rate of six per cent (6%) interest.

"Seller agrees to deliver said premises free and clear of all encumbrances, rents and insurance to be pro-rated. This deposit is taken subject to the approval of the owner, and if not accepted said check shall be returned to the purchaser. It is also given subject to the purchaser inspecting the said premises and lease.

"W. I. Hollingsworth & Company,
"Per F. W. Kadletz.

"We hereby agree to purchase the above described premises on the terms stated in this receipt.

"Fountain Cafeteria,
"By J. P. Simonsen, Prop.
"J. A. Fleming."

The offer was submitted to defendant either on the above date or the following day. He disapproved the terms, changed the purchase price stated therein to $50,000, the cash payment to $30,000, the rate of interest from 6 to 7 per cent. per annum, and also inserted therein the following: "All unbroken packages to be cash on invoice and dishes not in use." He then wrote thereon the following: "Approved by owner, F. A. Stillwell," and redelivered the writing to the broker's agent. According to the latter, the writing was then returned to Simonsen and Fleming, who agreed to the changes made by defendant, at 3 o'clock p. m. of September 30, wrote their acceptance upon Exhibit No. 2 in the words and figures shown above.

It was testified that following this on the same day the document last mentioned was presented to defendant at his office.

It appears that the lease under which defendant held the premises provided that the same should not be assigned or the premises sublet without the consent of the lessor. It was testified by the agent for the brokers that defendant was unable to obtain consent to the transfer of the lease or the subletting of the premises, and so admitted, and that thereafter on October 17, 1921, the deposit made by Simonsen and Fleming was returned to them. It was shown, however, that the latter and defendant continued negotiations, and on November 20, 1921, a contract for the sale of the cafeteria was made between them. This contract recited that the lease mentioned could not be assigned without the consent of the lessor, and that the latter's consent could only be obtained upon the payment of an increased rental. As part of this transaction, a new lease at an increased rent was executed by the owner of the premises to Simonsen and Fleming, and defendant by the contract agreed to sell the cafeteria to them for $45,000, $6,000 to be paid in cash and the balance in installments. The brokers' agent further testified that he was not consulted during these negotiations, and, while he sought on several occasions to communicate with defendant, the latter avoided him.

The findings which defendant contends are unsupported are as follows: The court found with respect to Plaintiff's Exhibits No. 1 and No. 2 that, while "said two instruments were executed at the same time they were not one agreement, nor were they so understood by the assignors"; also "that prior to the expiration of said forty-eight hours before the hour of 3:30 p. m. on said 30th day of September, 1921, said assignors effected a sale of said cafeteria and lease to J. P. Simonsen and J. A. Fleming, who at the time were ready, willing and able to purchase the same, and who agreed to purchase the same at the terms set forth by said defendant and agreed to by said A. L. Plotner, and said J. P. Simonsen and J. A. Fleming were accepted as purchasers by said defendant."

[1] While it is the rule that several contracts relating to the same matters are to be construed together (Civ. Code, § 1642), it does not follow that for all purposes they constitute one contract. The brokers' agent claimed that the two in question were not so intended, and the court so found. But whether this was true or not does not affect the result, as it sufficiently appears that the brokers procured from the buyers a binding obligation to purchase in accordance with the terms proposed by defendant.

[2-4] It is urged that there was no evidence that Simonsen and Fleming were able and willing to buy; but, as held in the following cases, where the owner accepts the buyer procured—which the evidence sufficiently shows was true in the present case—he thereby admits the readiness, willingness, and ability of the purchaser to consummate the sale (Wood & Tatum Co. v. Basler, 37 Cal. App. 381, 173 P. 1109; Sobaje v. Schubert, 37 Cal. App. 709, 174 P. 364; Freeman v. Creelman, 60 Cal. App. 14, 212 P. 56); and it has also been held that the execution by the owner of a contract of sale is conclusive proof that he is satisfied with the qualifications of the purchaser and his ability to carry out the terms of the contract (McNamara v. Steckman, 202 Cal. 569, 262 P. 297). While the defendant testified that the purchasers were unable or unwilling to make the payments provided, his credibility was a question for the trial court. We think it clear that the real reason for the failure to consummate the sale was defendant's inability to transfer the lease or sublet the premises. In this connection, although Plaintiff's Exhibit No. 2 expressly provided that the sale should include the lease, Plaintiff's Exhibit No. 3 made no express reference thereto, but provided only that the seller should deliver the premises free and clear of all incumbrances. However, as stated, these documents should be construed together; and, from the evidence taken as a whole, it was manifestly the intention that the lease should be included in the sale.

[5] Stress is laid upon the further finding that, after defendant was unable to procure a transfer of the lease, the agreement to purchase on the terms agreed was mutually abandoned. It is urged that this finding refers to the brokers as well as to the parties to the agreement to purchase. There is no merit in this contention. Moreover, the evidence sufficiently shows that there was no abandonment of the brokers' claim for commission, and that the deposit was returned only after the defendant had informed the brokers that he could not perform.

[6, 7] The evidence in many particulars was conflicting, and appellant urges that inferences supporting his contentions should properly have been drawn therefrom. The rule is well settled, however, that the inferences drawn by the trial court, if they find substantial support in the evidence—which was the case here—cannot be disturbed on appeal (Russell v. Ramm, 200 Cal. 348, 254 P. 532); and whenever from the facts found other facts may be inferred which will support the judgment, such inferences will be deemed to have been made by the trial court (Anglo-California Trust Co. v. Oakland Railways, 193 Cal. 451, 225 P. 452).

No other questions raised by appellant require discussion.

The evidence was sufficient to support the conclusions of the trial court, and nothing appears which would warrant a reversal of the judgment.

The judgment is affirmed.

Since appellate court's jurisdiction ceases when remittitur issues, superior court held authorized to stay execution on judgment for appeal costs, pending final determination of principal action.

CONREY, P. J., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walter S. Gates, Judge.

Action by the First National Bank of San Pedro against Charles Stansbury, with a cross-complaint by defendant, wherein John Balch was named as cross-defendant. From an order staying execution on a judgment for costs of appeal, pending final determination of issues on subsequent appeal, plaintiff and cross-defendant appeal.

Miller & Ellis, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

YORK, J.

On August 3, 1923, a judgment for costs of appeal in the sum of $1,242.55 was entered in above cause in favor of appellants and against respondent, in accordance with remittitur of this court on partial reversal upon an appeal in said cause reported in 62 Cal. App. 336, 217 P. 91. A mandamus proceeding was instituted by these appellants which resulted in a judgment against them for costs in the sum of $77.10, and a marginal satisfaction of the judgment of August 3, 1923, was entered to the extent of the sum of $77.10.

Upon a second trial of the principal cause judgment was rendered August 10, 1927, in favor of respondent and against appellants for $31.75 costs only, upon which judgment an appeal by the bank and Balch is still pending.

Under date of October 13, 1927, appellants caused a writ of execution to issue on the judgment of August 3, 1923, for the collection of the unpaid portion thereof. Respondent thereupon obtained from the superior court of Los Angeles county an order to show cause why appellants should not be enjoined from collecting the judgment of August 3, 1923, until the appeal taken from the judgment of August 10, 1927, should be determined. *Hearing granted 5 P.(2d) 11.

November 1, 1927, said superior court made its order staying execution of the judgment of August 3, 1923, pending final determination of the issues in the principal action, and this appeal is taken from such order.

Appellants' main point is that the trial court had no power to stay execution on a judgment of the appellate court for costs on appeal as provided in the remittitur.

The cases of Granger v. Sheriff, 140 Cal. 195, 73 P. 816, and Fischer v. Lukens, 41 Cal. App. 358, 182 P. 967, both hold that when the remittitur issues the jurisdiction of the appellate court ceases, and that of the superior court reattaches. We therefore hold that the superior court of Los Angeles county had the power, upon a satisfactory showing by respondents, to stay execution of the judgment until a final determination could be had of the issues in the main action. No abuse of its discretion on the part of the superior court is shown herein.

The order is affirmed.

I concur in the judgment: HOUSER, J.

CONREY, J. (dissenting).

I dissent. First, I agree that the record is sufficient to call for a decision on the merits. Respondent contends that the bill of exceptions was not presented within the time allowed by law, and that for that reason there is no record authorizing this court to consider the merits of the appeal. The order staying execution was made and filed on the first day of November, 1927. On November 10, an order was made and filed, extending for thirty days from that date, the time to prepare and serve a draft of bill of exceptions. On November 29, the proposed bill of exceptions was served on the attorneys for respondent. It was objected by the attorneys for respondent, on the presentation of the bill, that the same could not be considered, because a rule of the superior court, referring to orders extending time, required that "every such order shall be served and filed before ten o'clock a. m. of the next judicial day," whereas, in fact (as shown by affidavit), the order extending time was never served on respondent or his attorneys. The court overruled this objection, and settled the bill. It is my opinion that the said rule of court, in relation to service of the order, was not imperative in any such sense that the failure to serve deprived the court of jurisdiction to settle the bill. The refusal of the court to sustain the objection presumably was based upon a determination by the court that the omission to serve was inadvertent and excusable. Lynch v. Coe, 203 Cal. 422, 264 P. 747.

The order of November 1, 1927, from which the appeal now before us has been taken, was miscalled an order or decree of injunction. The proceeding is in its nature an application for stay of proceedings in execution of the judgment. The general question at issue may be stated thus: When, on appeal, a judgment has been reversed, and costs of the appeal have been awarded to the appellant and judgment for costs entered pursuant to the directions of the appellate court; and when thereafter the case has been tried again, with judgment in favor of the party against whom costs of the appeal had been assessed; and when thereafter a second appeal is pending, and issues are involved which ultimately might result in a money judgment against the party who obtained the costs judgment on the first appeal; may the trial court stay execution on the costs judgment, in order that the judgment debtor, if ultimately successful in the assertion of his claims in the action, may then set off the final judgment obtained by him, against the costs judgment of the first appeal? But this general question must be modified for the purpose of application to the present appeal. It should be remembered that the pending appeal in the Supreme Court is an appeal by the Bank and Balch. In that court Stansbury, as respondent, is defending a judgment in his favor for the sum of $31.75. If he is successful there he will have a final judgment for that sum only. The record before us shows, by an affidavit presented to the court on the hearing of the motion for stay of execution, and not denied, that appellants had given to the sheriff written instructions "to offset and satisfy" said sum of $31.75 out of the execution then in his hands. Under these circumstances, it seems clear that no lawful reason exists to justify a further stay of execution. The proceeding for stay of execution was not a suit in equity, based upon facts which, if proved, would justify interposition by a chancëllor to prevent enforcement of the judgment. Decisions relating to such suits in equity have no proper application to this case. So far as the case made by this record is concerned, the order staying proceedings in execution of the costs judgment against respondent is an arbitrary denial of a legal right.

For the foregoing reasons, I think that the order should be reversed.

MCGAFFEY CANNING CO., Inc., v. BANK OF AMERICA et al.

Civ. 7232.

District Court of Appeal, First District,
Division 1, California.

Nov. 10, 1930.

Rehearing Denied Dec. 10, 1930. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 8, 1931.

1. Attachment ⇨296.

Third-party claim not being pleading, technical niceties and verification should not overshadow claimant's right to possession of attached property (Code Civ. Proc. § 689).

2. Attachment ⇨296.

Third-party claim to attached property in form of affidavit setting out facts and sworn to is "claim verified by oath" within statute (Code Civ. Proc. § 689).

"Verify" is defined as to testify or affirm formally or upon oath.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Verification; Verify," see Words and Phrases.]

3. Attachment ⇨296.

Third-party claim in form of affidavit sworn to before authorized officer was sufficient without phraseology for verifying pleadings (Code Civ. Proc. § 689).

4. Attachment ⇨299.

Sheriff was not chargeable with conversion in respect to attached property released under third-party claim after refusal of attachment creditor to furnish indemnity bond (Civ. Code, § 3440).

Since the contents of the third-party claim were sufficient to state an apparent right in claimant, as pledgee, to possession of attached property, the sheriff was not required to determine at his peril whether or not the circumstances connected with the issuance of warehouse receipts and delivery to claimant as set out in third-party claim satisfied provisions of Civ. Code, § 3440.

5. Sheriffs and constables ⇨140.

Evidence respecting sheriff's release of attached property did not warrant nonsuit as to sheriff in conversion action.

Although greater part of attached property was released in accordance with third-party claim after attachment creditor's failure to furnish indemnity bond, there was affirmative testimony that, in addition to property claimed, there was other additional property apparently released, although of minor value.

6. Attachment ⇨299.

Statutory provision authorizing sheriff to release property claimed by third person, unless indemnifying bond is given, does not protect third person asserting invalid claim (Code Civ. Proc. § 689).

7. Attachment ⇨299.

Failure of attaching creditor to furnish indemnity does not absolve hostile claimant of all liability for wrongful appropriation.

8. Attachment ⇨177.

Lien acquired by attachment is vested interest affording specific security for satisfaction of debt.

9. Attachment ⇨186.

Attached property in custody of sheriff was constructively in possession of attaching creditor through sheriff as agent.

10. Trover and conversion ⇨17.

Any one with lien on property may maintain action for damages against person whose acts diminish value of security or render it ineffectual.

11. Trover and conversion ⇨3.

Though conversion action requires evidence of tortious exercise of dominion, defiance of injured party's rights need not be willful or corrupt.

12. Trover and conversion ⇨4.

Any wrongful assumption of authority over chattels, inconsistent with another's right of possession or subversive of vested interest, amounts to "conversion."

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Conversion," see Words and Phrases.]

13. Trover and conversion ⇨17.

Special interest of attaching creditor in property held in sheriff's custody as agent is sufficient foundation for action for conversion.

14. Trover and conversion ⇨4.

Affirmative act in defiance of attachment lien without legal excuse and leading to relinquishment of property by sheriff constitutes "conversion."

15. Attachment ⇨313.

Claimant securing release of attached property under third-party claim, unless in fact legally justified in claiming as trustee, was liable in conversion for nullification of attachment lien.

16. Trial ⇨165.

Testimony conflicting with testimony supporting plaintiff's contention must be disregarded for purposes of nonsuit.

17. Warehousemen ⇨15(3).

Delivery of warehouse receipt to one lending money on security of merchandise stored is equivalent to delivery of merchandise.

18. Warehousemen ⇨15(3).

Efficacy of pledgee's symbolic possession of pledged property by delivery of warehouse receipt depends on pledgor's complete relinquishment of possession and control.

19. Warehousemen ⇨15(3).

Warehousing by pledgor without open, visible, unequivocal change in possession manifested by substantial outward signs that control of property has wholly ceased is ineffective (Civ. Code, § 3440).

20. Pledges ⇨11.

"Actual change of possession" required to validate pledge means actually existing and truly and absolutely carried out (Civ. Code, § 3440).

21. Pledges ⇨11.

Actual change of possession validating pledge must be shown by particular facts and circumstances and usually determined by court or jury from all evidence (Civ. Code, § 3440).

22. Warehousemen ⇨15(3).

Appointment of owner, or one of staff, as warehouseman's custodian of goods stored, is circumstance for consideration on question of actual change of possession.

23. Pledges ⇨11.

Pledgee of property in pledgor's field warehouse must so segregate and mark it as to indicate his possession to ordinarily prudent business men.

24. Pledges ⇨11.

Actual, open, visible, and unequivocal change of possession validating pledge of attached goods to holder of warehouse receipt held for jury (Civ. Code, § 3440).

Appeal from Superior Court, Ventura County; T. A. Norton, Judge.

Action by McGaffey Canning Company, Inc., against the Bank of America and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals.

Reversed.

Superseding opinion in 284 P. 977.

Meserve, Mumper, Hughes & Robertson and Baldwin Robertson, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

James C. Hollingsworth, of Ventura, for respondents Robert E. Clark and National Surety Co.

Frank M. Bering, of Los Angeles, for respondents Bank of America and Lawrence Warehouse Co.

JOHNSON, Justice pro tem.

This action, begun in Los Angeles county and afterwards transferred for trial to Ventura county, sounds in conversion. A jury was impaneled for the trial of the case, but, the court having granted a motion for a nonsuit, the plaintiff appealed from the judgment thereupon entered in favor of all the defendants.

According to the record, the motion purports to have been made only on behalf of the defendants Bank of America and Lawrence Warehouse Company. Upon the appeal, however, the parties have dealt with the case as if the other defendants had joined in the motion, and, accordingly, we do likewise.

Our previous decision of the appeal (284 P. 977) was vacated and a reargument had in order to give consideration to certain matters which were not discussed in the original briefs; but were first pressed upon the attention of the court in the petitions for rehearing. In fact, one of the legal points now stressed by plaintiff was not raised at all until presented in a supplemental brief filed by plaintiff after the reargument. To that brief and the new point there urged the defendants have made no reply.

This action is a sequel to an action brought by the same plaintiff in Los Angeles county against William F. Gasman, in which judgment for $10,240 went in favor of plaintiff on May 2, 1924. In that action plaintiff had caused a writ of attachment to issue on August 20, 1923, to the sheriff of Ventura county. The writ was accompanied by instructions to the sheriff to attach all canned goods, cans, cases, and other materials of the debtor in the canning plant located at Camarillo, in Ventura county, operated under the name of Ventura County Canning Company, which was a copartnership composed of Gasman and two others, William Heck and W. A. Clarke. According to the return of the sheriff, he levied upon 12,000 cases of canned apricots and all other personal property of said Gasman by taking such property into his custody and placing a keeper in charge. Of the 12,000 cases of apricots, 4,000 are described in the return as No. 10 cans, and 8,000 as No. 2½ cans. Thereupon, the Bank of America, through its vice president, made a third-party claim to 7,773 cases of No. 2½ cans and 3,958 cases of No. 10 cans, or a total of 11,731 cases, which were then in the custody of the sheriff under the writ, and valued in the claim at $40,000.

In its claim the bank averred that it had made certain loans to the Ventura County Canning Company on the security of the property described, and that such property was held by the bank in pledge by virtue of warehouse receipts issued by the Lawrence Warehouse Company in favor of the bank, and delivered into the bank's possession before the attachment. The Lawrence Warehouse Company is a corporation with its office and principal place of business in Los Angeles; and the contention of the defendants is that this company was warehousing the canned apricots in the premises in which the canning operations were being conducted by the Ventura County Canning Company.

Upon receipt of the bank's claim the sheriff duly notified the plaintiff. After some hesitation the plaintiff refused to furnish an indemnity bond to the sheriff, upon the ground that the claim was legally insufficient, and that there had not been the change of possession required by law for consummation of a pledge. Left without the protection of an indemnity bond, the sheriff withdrew his keeper, thus releasing from his custody, not only the 11,731 cases claimed by the bank, but also whatever else had been seized under the writ. The apricots included in the claim of the bank and so released from attachment were ultimately delivered by the warehouse company to the bank and sold by the bank for its own account, the entire proceeds being applied towards satisfaction of its loans.

The judgment obtained later by plaintiff against Gasman remaining wholly unsatisfied, plaintiff began this action on December 8, 1924 against the bank, the warehouse company, the sheriff, and the surety on the sheriff's official bond, to recover damages for conversion.

[1-3] So far as the sheriff and his surety are concerned, the chief point presented by plaintiff relates to the sufficiency of the third-party claim. It was made on behalf of the bank by the vice president in the form of an affidavit, to which the affiant took oath before a notary public. Plaintiff contends that an oath so taken by a claimant, without addition of the phraseology used in verifying a pleading, is not a "claim verified by his oath" within the meaning of section 689, Code of Civil Procedure. Such a claim, however, is not a pleading, and may frequently have to be drawn by persons unfamiliar with legal jargon. The affidavit criticized conforms to the usual practice, and in such matters technical niceties should not overshadow the rights of a claimant to legal possession. One of the definitions of the word "verify" in the Standard Dictionary is "to affirm under oath," and in the New English Dictionary one of the meanings given is "to testify or affirm formally or upon oath." In our opinion an affidavit setting out the facts and sworn to before an authorized officer meets fully the demands of the law, and puts the attaching creditor to his election either to protect the sheriff with a sufficient indemnity bond or to submit to release by the sheriff of the property claimed.

The plaintiff argues that the sheriff's liability is governed by the decision in Arena v. Bank of Italy, 194 Cal. 195, 228 P. 441. In that case, however, there was first filed a claim clearly insufficient on its face, and hence, under the law as it read at the time, the claim furnished no basis for the demand for indemnity made by the sheriff. An amended claim was then filed, and, upon the strength of the amended claim, the sheriff, without any further demand, released the attached property. Such release, without notice to the attaching creditor or renewal of the demand for indemnification, was held to be contrary to law. The case has no similarity to the case before us.

In this instance the contents of the claim were sufficient to state an apparent right in the bank, as a pledgee, to possession of 11,731 cases, and the sheriff was not required to assume a judicial pose and determine, at his peril, whether or not the circumstances connected with the issuance of the warehouse receipts and their delivery to the bank satisfied the provisions of section 3440 of the Civil Code. Where a litigant's courage oozes under the pressure of a demand for indemnification against a third-party claim sufficient on its face, the law will not make the sheriff the scapegoat. Taylor v. Bernheim, 58 Cal. App. 404, 408, 209 P. 55.

[4, 5] So far, then, as concerns the 11,731 cases claimed by the bank, the sheriff is not chargeable with conversion. But his return shows seizure and custody of a total of 12,000 cases of apricots and all other personal property of the debtor found in the premises. Under section 4159 of the Political Code the sheriff's return is prima facie evidence of the facts therein stated; and, in addition, the record contains affirmative testimony of the undersheriff and of William Heck, one of Gasman's partners, that, besides the apricots claimed, there was a small lot of canned goods and some other things stored in the warehouse. Such additional property, which was apparently released by withdrawal of the keeper, was clearly of minor value; and in the briefs originally filed by plaintiff no charge on this score was made against the sheriff or his surety. In plaintiff's petition for rehearing, however, the contention was made that the sheriff had released, to plaintiff's prejudice, property not included in the bank's claim, and that as to such property, at any rate, plaintiff was entitled to have the case submitted to the jury. The plaintiff is technically within its rights in this contention, and we must hold that, upon the evidence as it stood at the time of the motion,

The really vital questions in the case, between the plaintiff on the one hand and the bank and the warehouse company on the other, are whether, as to the property claimed by the bank, there had been a change of possession sufficient to protect the bank as a pledgee; and, if not, whether dominion and control achieved by interjection of a wrongful third-party claim, and the resulting defeat of the attachment lien, amounted to a conversion of the property so taken from the custody of the sheriff.

This latter question was not raised in the trial court on the motion for a nonsuit, that motion having been predicated and granted solely upon the asserted ground that the evidence conclusively showed, as a matter of law, that there had been an actual delivery of possession by the Ventura Canning Company to the Lawrence Warehouse Company, which had issued its warehouse receipts to the Bank of America and was at the time of the attachment maintaining possession in behalf of the bank. The defendants insist that the warehouse company was using the premises of the Ventura Canning Company as a so-called "field warehouse," and had acquired, as a warehouseman, sufficient legal possession for the issuance of effective warehouse receipts.

In determining the propriety of the judgment of nonsuit in favor of the bank and the warehouse company, the question whether liability for conversion may follow procurement of possession by the interposition of an unsustainable third-party claim may more conveniently be considered before adverting to the subject of "field warehousing."

The bank in its petition for rehearing contended that plaintiff's failure to maintain the attachment by giving the sheriff an indemnity bond worked a forfeiture of the attachment lien, leaving the property claimed as fully subject to the control and disposition of the claimant as if the sheriff had never made seizure, and that as a result no action for conversion could lie in favor of the plaintiff.

Such result undoubtedly follows when an attachment is intercepted by a claim sufficient in form which is also lawfully grounded. But plaintiff in its brief, filed after the reargument, urged for the first time that the frustration of an attachment lien by assertion of a claim wrongful in fact must necessarily find its remedy in an action for conversion. This contention, made late it is true, has not been answered by the defendants, and on neither side do the briefs contain any citations directly on the point. We have been left, therefore, to our own independent study and research.

[6] Section 689 of the Code of Civil Procedure authorizes the sheriff to release attached property claimed by a third person, unless the attaching creditor gives the sheriff an indemnifying bond in double the value of the property. This provision, as we conceive, is for the protection of the sheriff, and is not designed to give immunity to a third person who defeats the attachment by assertion of a specious or invalid claim.

[7] It is true that the attaching creditor may preserve his lien by indemnifying the sheriff, but that may not always be a practicable remedy. In this instance the value placed on the property claimed was $40,000; and the plaintiff had to elect between furnishing a bond of $80,000 or submitting to relinquishment of custody by the sheriff. One might well pause under such circumstances and it may not be said that the failure of an attaching creditor to furnish indemnity absolves a hostile claimant of all liability for wrongful appropriation. Smith v. Kaufman, 94 Ala. 364, 367, 10 So. 229.

[8] The lien acquired by an attachment is a vested interest affording specific security for satisfaction of the debt put in suit. If this security is made worthless by unlawful procurement of the property under an invalid third-party claim, there is no undertaking to which the attaching creditor may have recourse. Hence, without immediate opportunity for a judicial probe of the claimant's title, the creditor must go remediless, unless the law reserves to him a right of action for damages for tortious intermeddling with his attachment lien. In this connection it is to be noted that at the time in question the statute did not provide, as it now does, for an immediate judicial hearing, on petition of the attaching creditor, to determine the title of the claimant.

[9, 10] While the property was in the custody of the sheriff, it was constructively in the possession of plaintiff through the sheriff as his agent. Taylor v. Bernheim, 58 Cal. App. 404, 408, 209 P. 55. And one who has a lien on property, though not in actual physical possession of it, may maintain an action for damages against any person whose acts diminish the value of the security or render it ineffectual. Hansbrough v. Standrod & Co., (Idaho) 286 P. 923; 11 C. J. 9, § 19.

[11] While an action for conversion requires evidence of a tortious exercise of dominion, the defiance of the injured party's rights need not be willful or corrupt. 24 Cal. Jur. 1023. It is the substantial injury inflicted which constitutes the gravamen of the action.

the defendants acted in bad faith. If it should appear that they obtained the goods fairly from a person whom they had reason to think was the true owner, or if they acted under a mistake as to the plaintiffs' title, or under an honest but mistaken belief that the property was their own, they would still be liable to plaintiffs if their acts in regard to it amount to a conversion. If they have taken it into their own hands or disposed of it to others, or exercised any dominion over it whatever, they are guilty of a conversion, and their liability to plaintiffs is established." An unjustified claim of title may amount to conversion (Kilmer v. Hutton, 131 App. Div. 625, 116 N. Y. S. 127, 136); and, though the claimant may act in good faith or under mistake, yet he is not exonerated from liability where the law charges him with the duty to know before he intrudes. (First National Bank v. Morgan, 213 Ala. 125, 128, 104 So. 403; U. S. Zinc Co. v. Colburn, 124 Okl. 249, 250, 255 P. 688).

[13, 14] The special interest which an attaching creditor has in property held in the custody of the sheriff as his agent is a sufficient foundation for an action for conversion. Carvell v. Weaver, 54 Cal. App. 734, 737, 202 P. 897. And an affirmative act in defiance of the attachment lien, done without legal excuse and leading to relinquishment of the property by the sheriff, does constitute conversion. In Gafford v. Stearns, 51 Ala. 434, 442, the court said: "Possession, and the right of possession, accompanied by a lien for the payment of money advanced, or a debt previously contracted, entitles the plaintiff to maintain the action against any one disturbing his possession." In consonance with this principle, a purchaser of grain, in Hahn v. Sleepy Eye Milling Co., 21 S. D. 324, 112 N. W. 843, was held liable in conversion to a threshing company which had a paramount statutory lien. In like manner, in Kennard v. Harvey, 80 Ind. 37, the purchase and removal of a tenant's crop, with notice of a landlord's statutory lien, was declared to amount to conversion. So also, in Hugo State Bank v. Hugo Nat. Bank, 96 Okl. 135, 220 P. 868, appropriation by the defendant of crops on which a lien had been created by contract was treated as a conversion. A somewhat similar case arose in Rew v. Maynes, 147 Iowa, 15, 125 N. W. 804. In that case, while the judgment went against the landlord because he predicated his right of recovery on ownership of the crop instead of on impairment of his lien, the court took occasion to mark the distinction. "If," it said, "plaintiff had predicated his right to recover on his contract lien, and demanded from defendant possession of the corn on the ground that the security of his lien was impaired to the extent to which corn was taken from the premises by defendant, he would have had a right of action for conversion." Again, in Mogul Producing & Re- fining Co. v. S. Engine & Pump Co. (Tex. Civ. App.) 244 S. W. 212, a materialman, who had a lien for removable pumps installed in a refinery, recovered damages for conversion from a purchaser of the property who refused to surrender the pumps. In analogy with the cases cited, reference may be made to Interstate National Bank v. McCormick, 67 Mont. 80, 214 P. 949, 34 A. L. R. 721. There, goods shipped by rail to a buyer were detained in the custody of the carrier by an injunction procured by the buyer in an action against the seller, and were so held for eighteen days, until demurrage charges exceeded the value. The draft for the purchase price, to which the bill of lading was annexed, was payable to the bank, which, not being a party to the injunction suit, could have no recourse to the injunction bond. Accordingly, since the injunction interfered unlawfully with the bank's right of control and disposition of the goods, the bank was adjudged entitled to recover damages from the buyer in an action for conversion.

In accord with the views expressed in the cases cited, we have the declaration of our own Supreme Court in denying the petition for rehearing in Arena v. Bank of Italy, 194 Cal. 195, 211, 228 P. 441, 448. Speaking there of release of attached property on a third-party claim insufficient in law, the court said: "This being so, and said bank having been a co-actor with its codefendant, the sheriff, in procuring an unlawful release of the property in question from the lien of said attachment and the delivery thereof to itself, it must be held liable for whatever damages the plaintiff sustained from the conversion of said property accomplished thereby." In the Arena Case the claim presented was insufficient on its face; but, as to a claimant, we perceive no difference in principle, whether the destruction of the attachment lien is accomplished by a claim insufficient on its face or by a claim which, though valid on its face, is invalid in fact. In either case the injury inflicted is the same.

[15] Accordingly, we reach the conclusion here that, unless the Bank of America was in fact legally justified in claiming as a pledgee, the plaintiff should be entitled to recover in conversion for the nullification of its attachment lien.

We are thus brought back to the inquiry whether it may be said that, as a matter of law, plaintiff's evidence conclusively established the existence of a valid pledge to the bank.

In considering this question it will be necessary to have in mind the circumstances surrounding the dealings between the parties. The canning business of the Ventura County Canning Company was carried on in a workshop or factory at Camarillo, rented from the California Fruit Confection Company, which conducted its business on the other side of a wooden partition in the same building. The rent payable by the canning company was 12½ cents per case, and its output for the canning season was about 50,000 cases. A man named Pace, employed by the canning company, served as its cookroom foreman and superintended the canning operations, at a salary of $60 per week.

With the consent of its landlord, the canning company, on June 28, 1923, sublet its entire shop, on a month to month tenancy, to the Lawrence Warehouse Company, at a rent of $1 per month, for warehouse purposes. This lease was recorded July 28, 1923.

Notwithstanding this sublease the canning company continued to conduct its business in the shop as before, using during the apricot season 150 to 200 employees. Pace continued to act as cookroom foreman; and at the same time he acted also as the sole representative of the Lawrence Warehouse Company on the premises. In fact, he drew his salary of $60 a week from the warehouse company, and that company then rendered a bill for the amount to the canning company. Practically all Pace's time was given to superintendence of the canning processes. At night an employee of the canning company slept on a cot in a cubby-hole above a small office partitioned off from the shop, and during the night the premises with its contents were in his care.

When the cans had been filled and were ready for stacking, they were moved on trucks to another part of the shop and stacked by skilled employees of the canning company, in rows set about four and a half feet apart, and reaching to the ceiling. At the time of the attachment there were three or four such stacks in place. Frames made of slats were placed around the several stacks for the purpose of separating them and simplifying the count. The canning was done at the north end of the shop and the storage at the south end. There was nothing to separate the canning department from the storage department except an intervening space about fifteen feet in width.

As the cases were stacked, they were inventoried by Pace who kept the records. He then issued nonnegotiable warehouse receipts for the Lawrence Warehouse Company. The form used was an acknowledgment of receipt for storage "for account of, and to be delivered upon written order, without surrender of this receipt, to Bank of America, Los Angeles."

Referring to these receipts, Heck, one of the partners interested in the cannery, said in his testimony: "We jumped in the car, as soon as we got them, and went to Los Angeles, and to the Bank of America, and got all the money we could."

As receipts were issued, stack cards of the Lawrence Warehouse Company were placed on the stacks, about six feet from the floor, each specifying the aisle, stack, and mark, and giving the date, lot number, and quantity. These cards bore, also, the statement, "Warehoused to Bank of America."

When fruit was to be marketed, a release was issued from the Los Angeles office of the Lawrence Warehouse Company on order of the Bank of America; and, upon delivery of the release to Pace, withdrawal of the quantity designated followed. The cans were then labeled, packed in cases, and shipped by the canning company to fill orders obtained through brokers, who appear to have assumed responsibility to the bank for the proceeds of sale.

The canning company really paid Pace's salary; and though the warehouse company, according to the sublease, was charged the nominal rent of $1 per month, there was an accompanying agreement obligating the canning company to pay the warehouse company for issuing receipts three cents per case for the first 50,000 cases and lesser amounts for additional quantities.

[16] No sign of the Ventura County Canning Company seems to have been displayed on the building. There was a sign of the California Fruit Confection Company on the outside, and a sign of the Lawrence Warehouse Company inside the shop near the south end. While Mr. Heck said the warehouse company had two of its signs on the outside, his co-partner, Mr. Clarke, said there was none on the outside to his knowledge. For purposes of nonsuit the testimony of Heck on this point must be disregarded.

The question now before us is whether, under the circumstances recited, there was error in granting the motions of the bank and the warehouse company for a nonsuit instead of letting the case go to the jury as to them.

[17, 18] When there is actual delivery of merchandise to a warehouseman, with actual and explicit change of possession, and a warehouse receipt is issued and delivered to one lending money on the security of the merchandise in store, the delivery of the warehouse receipt is the legal equivalent of the delivery of the merchandise itself; but such symbolic possession by the pledgee is dependent for its efficacy upon complete and actual, as distinguished from merely formal or colorable, relinquishment of possession and control by the pledgor.

If, under the facts of this case, there was a transfer of possession from the canning company to the warehouse company of such exclusive character that it must be declared, as a matter of law, that there was indisputable compliance with the requirements of section 3440, Civil Code, then the judgment of nonsuit was properly entered; but if a contrary conclusion was reasonably deducible from the evidence, the case should have been allowed to go to the jury as the triers of the facts.

It is contended by the defendants that the warehouse company used the premises as a so-called "field warehouse," and cases from other jurisdictions are cited in support of such a system and as authority for the order of nonsuit.

Union Trust Co. v. Wilson, 198 U. S. 530, 25 S. Ct. 766, 49 L. Ed. 1154, certifies answers to certain questions propounded by the Circuit Court of Appeals in a case arising in Illinois. A leather dealer named Flanders walled off a part of his basement and let it at a nominal rent to the Security Warehouse Company. The compartment had doors fastened with padlocks bearing the name of the company, and the warehouse company had the only keys. It had also a key to the building, so as to have access both day and night. There were two signs on the outside, stating in large letters that the premises were occupied by the company as a public warehouseman. The company received leather from Flanders, stored it in the locked compartment, and issued warehouse receipts, which were indorsed by Flanders to the Union Trust Company as security for loans. Flanders became bankrupt and the trustee for creditors filed a bill, claiming the leather in storage. The court said that no question under the statutes of Illinois was suggested, and that since the warehouse company had the leather under lock and key in a place not visible to Flanders' patrons, to which the company had legal title and right of free access, and since there was no reason to doubt the good faith of the transaction, there was a sufficient delivery to validate the pledge. In so ruling the court is careful, however, to say (page 537 of 198 U. S., 25 S. Ct. 766, 768): "We deal with the case before us only. No doubt there are other cases in which the exclusive power of the so-called bailee gradually tapers away until we reach those in which the courts have held as matter of law that there was no adequate bailment."

Manufacturers' & Traders' Bank v. Gilman (C. C. A.) 7 F.(2d) 94, 95, is a similar case. There engines and engine parts were kept in a locked room for the bank as a pledgee. There was a written indenture of trust, whereby the general manager of the pledgor was named as trustee for the bank. He had the key to the room, which was rented to the bank, and the stored material was tagged so as to state that it was "Property of N. B. Gladwin, Trustee." In a proceeding instituted by the receiver in bankruptcy against the bank it was held that there was a valid pledge.

Sexton v. Kessler & Co., 225 U. S. 90, 32 S. Ct. 657, 56 L. Ed. 995, is a case brought by a trustee in bankruptcy to set aside a certain alleged illegal preference in the transfer of securities. The New York house of Kessler & Co. was indebted to the English house of the same name, and, for the protection of that creditor, set apart certain earmarked securities, which were kept on a separate shelf in the firm's vault and listed in a document transmitted to the English house. In the panic of 1907 the New York house became embarrassed and filed a petition in bankruptcy. Before doing so, however, it delivered the earmarked securities to an agent of the English house then in New York. It was held that the English house had an equitable lien superior to the rights of the trustee. This case can hardly be said to have a bearing on the case before us, especially since such securities are not in the same class with goods and chattels.

The remaining cases cited by defendants were either heard upon appeal after a decision in the trial court upon the facts, or were decisions rendered by the trial judge after taking the evidence himself, or upon a hearing after reference to a master to take testimony and report his conclusions. Thus, in Dunn v. Train (C. C. A.) 125 F. 221, 222, the court said: "It being a question of intention, and a question whether the change in the situation of the property was such as to be notice of a change of possession, it was, under the circumstances, largely a question of fact, to be determined under rules of law." And the findings of the trial judge in favor of the pledgee were sustained. A similar situation existed in Love v. Export Storage Co. (C. C. A.) 143 F. 1.

Bush v. Export Storage Co. (C. C.) 136 F. 918, and Evans v. New York & P. S. S. Co. (D. C.) 163 F. 405, were decisions by the trial judge after submission of the cause upon the evidence taken before him. Again Philadelphia Warehouse Co. v. Winchester (C. C.) 156 F. 600, and American Can Co. v. Erie Preserving Co. (C. C.) 171 F. 548, were decisions confirming the master's report. Israel v. Woodruff (C. C. A.) 299 F. 454, falls into the same category, being an appeal from a decree confirming the report of the master. The Appellate Court there said (page 456 of 299 F.): "The experienced trial judge having approved the master's report, it will be permitted to stand, unless an obvious error has intervened in the application of the law, or some serious or important mistake appears to have been made in the consideration of the evidence." National Union Bank v. Shearer, 225 Pa. 470, 74 A. 351, 17 Ann. Cas. 664, and State v. Robb-Lawrence Co., 17 N. D. 257, 115 N. W. 846, 16 L. R. A. (N. S.) 227, have but a remote application to the present case; but each came up for review of a judgment entered upon the verdict of a jury, and the judgment was affirmed.

While in American Can Co. v. Erie Preserving Co. (C. C.) reported in 171 F. at page 548, the trial judge approved the master's report to the effect that the goods pledged were conspicuously marked and set apart in a way to give the pledgee exclusive dominion, yet in a companion case, bearing the same title and reported in the same volume at page 540, the same judge, dealing with other goods, found that there was only a semblance of an attempt to warehouse those goods in the premises of the pledgor. Accordingly in that case he held that there was no such change of possession as to validate the receipts in the hands of the pledgee. The judgments in both these cases were affirmed on appeal in American Can Co. v. Erie Preserving Co. (C. C. A.) 183 F. 96, the court, as to the case reported in 171 F. 540, saying (page 98 of 183 F.): "Warehouse receipts would give constructive possession of goods actually warehoused; but it is plain that the warehousing company did not maintain a warehouse in any proper sense, because it had no exclusive and unequivocal possession."

In Macdonald v. Aetna Indemnity Co., 90 Conn. 415, 97 A. 332, cited also by defendants, one Rodebaugh, a grain dealer at Buffalo, entered into a written contract with the American Warehousing Company, whereby he leased to the warehouse company as a "field storage warehouse" the property on which his grain business was conducted. The plot of ground was marked at the corners by stakes bearing the initials of the warehouse company; and one of Rodebaugh's employees acted as custodian for the warehouse company. Warehouse receipts were issued to the Bank of Buffalo as collateral security for loans to Rodebaugh. The bank was further protected by bonds given by the Aetna Indemnity Company to indemnify against any loss "through the negligence or dishonesty" of the warehouse company or its custodian. After the lease to the warehouse company, and before the issuance of receipts to the bank, Rodebaugh transferred his business to the Niagara Company, of which he became president; and upon Rodebaugh's death, a few months later, the Niagara Company filed a petition in bankruptcy, and a receiver was appointed, who took the grain into his possession. Immediately after Rodebaugh's death, however, the warehouse company had asserted its right to possession of the grain, and placarded the interior of the mill, the elevator, the bins, and bags with conspicuous signs declaring its interest in the property, and maintained possession until ousted by the receiver. The receiver having taken and sold the grain, the bank caused suit to be brought by the insurance commissioner on the indemnity bond furnished by the warehouse company, charging negligence by that company. In the trial court the judgment sustained the claim of the Bank of Buffalo under the bond. This judgment was reversed on appeal; but the court said that up to the time of Rodebaugh's death there had been no such change of possession as to validate a pledge; that the marking of corner stakes was not adequate notice, and any possession of the custodian, who remained in the employ of the pledgor, was really the possession of his employer. The case turned on what was done by the warehouse company the day following Rodebaugh's death and two weeks before the appointment of the receiver. The court ruled that possession was then actually taken before any specific lien had been acquired by any creditor, and that there had been no illegal preference under the bankruptcy law. In its decision the court took into consideration the statute of New York. At the time of the transactions, which occurred between January, 1906, and August, 1907, the statute had a qualification not embodied in section 3440 of our Civil Code. The statute then in force in New York declared transfers without actual change of possession fraudulent, "unless it appear, on the part of the person claiming, under the sale or assignment, that it was made in good faith, and without intent to defraud such creditors or purchasers." 4 Consol. Laws of N. Y. c. 41, § 36. Under our law good faith, without good works, supplies no saving grace.

In Union Trust Co. v. Wilson, 198 U. S. 530, 537, 25 S. Ct. 766, 768, 49 L. Ed. 1154, the general principle applicable in cases of questioned change of possession was couched by Judge Holmes in this form: "When there is conscious control, the intent to exclude and the exclusion of others, with access to the place of custody as of right, there are all the elements of possession in the fullest sense." At the same time he added a word of caution about cases where the exclusive power of control "tapers away."

Such a case is exhibited in In re Rodgers (C. C. A.) 125 F. 169. There, Rodgers, a dealer in seeds in Chicago, prior to his bankruptcy, had made certain written contracts with the National Storage Company, whereby Rodgers leased to the company part of his premises, and the storage company agreed to store his goods therein and issue its receipts therefor. The receipts were used by Rodgers as collateral security for loans. The storage company had some signs inside the building, but not conspicuously placed; and its inspector visited the premises several times a week. The keys, however, were kept by Rodgers alone, access being obtainable only through him; and he continued to conduct his business on the premises as of old. Upon each pile of bags for which receipts were issued there was placed a small tag; but Rodgers was left in a situation to deal with the seeds much as he pleased. In a controversy which arose between the trustee in bankruptcy and the holders of receipts, the court ruled upon appeal that there had never been a change of possession sufficient to validate the receipts,

In Security Warehousing Co. v. Hand, 206 U. S. 415, 27 S. Ct. 720, 51 L. Ed. 1117, 11 Ann. Cas. 789, affirming the decree of the Circuit Court of Appeals upon the facts recited in 143 F. 32, the court said in reference to certain warehouse receipts issued to the Racine Knitting Company and transferred to pledgees (page 421 of 206 U. S., 27 S. Ct. 720, 722): "The general law of pledge requires possession, and it cannot exist without it. Casey v. Cavaroc, 96 U. S. 467, 24 L. Ed. 779. There was scarcely a semblance of an attempt at such change of possession from the hands of the knitting company to the hands of the warehousing company. Actual possession of the property in question was exercised by and existed with the knitting company substantially the same after the issuing of the receipts as before. It is a trifling with words to call the various transactions between the knitting company and the warehousing company a transfer of possession from the former to the latter. There was really no delivery, and no change of possession, continuous or otherwise. The alleged change was a mere pretense, a sham."

In that case the Racine Knitting Company had leased to the warehouse company certain portions of the knitting company's premises both at Racine and at Stevens Point, Wis. Employees of the knitting company, nominated by the warehouse company, acted as custodians for the latter. The stored goods were kept within slatted inclosures or fencelike palings, and the inclosures were provided with sliding doors secured with padlocks to which the appointed custodian had keys. These, however, were kept by the custodian in such a way as to be accessible when desired by officers of the knitting company. There were some interior signs of the warehouse company, and some use was made of identification cards also. Nevertheless it was held that the facts did not show the open, exclusive, unequivocal possession required by law.

Warehousing on the premises of the owner proposing to pledge his merchandise is effective when done in obedience to legal requirements; but when done only far enough to get the goods represented by documents without really getting them stored, the documents are but scraps of paper. The term "field warehousing" is not a talisman to give dominion by enchantment. Taking exclusiveness of possession and control as the criterion, we find now and then a case where it may be said as a matter of law that, through the field warehouse, open, exclusive, and unequivocal possession passed constructively to a pledgee; and then again in other cases we find that as a matter of law the possession of the warehouseman "tapers away" to nothingness. Between these two extremes lies the aggregation of cases in which the facts are such that different men may with reason reach opposing conclusions. Cases of that character, when tried by a jury, must be allowed to go under proper instructions to the jury for their determination of the facts in controversy.

[19] Whether warehousing is called "field warehousing" or by any other name, it cannot be effectively conducted in this state without compliance with the law as declared in section 3440 of the Civil Code. Merely colorable or constructive change of possession accomplishes nothing in favor of a pledgee. There must be open, visible, unequivocal change of possession, manifested by such substantial outward signs as to make it evident to the world that the control of the owner has wholly ceased, and that another has acquired, and is openly exercising, the exclusive dominion over the property. Stevens v. Irwin, 15 Cal. 503, 506, 76 Am. Dec. 500; Cahoon v. Marshall, 25 Cal. 197, 201; Godchaux v. Mulford, 26 Cal. 316, 324, 85 Am. Dec. 178; Sequeira v. Collins, 153 Cal. 426, 431, 95 P. 876; Hassell v. Bunge, 167 Cal. 365, 366, 139 P. 800.

[20, 21] Actual change of possession means existing in act, and truly and absolutely carried out, as opposed to formal, potential, virtual, or theoretical change. Bunting v. Saltz, 84 Cal. 168, 170, 24 P. 167; Guthrie v. Carney, 19 Cal. App. 144, 150, 124 P. 1045. The proof required to show actual change of possession is not measured by any fixed set of rules. Dependence must be placed upon the facts and circumstances of each particular case; and usually the determination must rest upon the finding of the court or the jury after hearing the evidence adduced on both sides. Claudius v. Aguirre, 89 Cal. 501, 503, 26 P. 1077; Dubois v. Spinks, 114 Cal. 289, 293, 46 P. 95; Feeley v. Boyd, 143 Cal. 282, 285, 76 P. 1029, 65 L. R. A. 943; Jarvis v. Webber, 196 Cal. 86, 99, 236 P. 138; Bosbyshell v. Cline, 51 Cal. App. 109, 113, 196 P. 274; Gray v. Little, 97 Cal. App. 442, 449, 275 P. 870.

[22] The appointment of the owner, or one of his staff, as a warehouseman's custodian of goods stored, while not conclusively ineffectual, is nevertheless a circumstance to give pause, and must be carefully weighed in connection with the other facts in evidence. Goldstein v. Nunan, 66 Cal. 542, 544, 6 P. 451; Hickey v. Coschina, 133 Cal. 81, 84, 65 P. 313; Bucher v. Allen, 11 Cal. App. 650, 651, 105 P. 942; Vail v. Nichibel Bussan Co., 65 Cal. App. 60, 63, 223 P. 577; Gray v. Little, 97 Cal. App. 442, 449, 275 P. 870.

In this case a foreign element is introduced by the interjection of the warehouse company between the pledgor and the pledgee. If the loans had been made without resort to warehouse receipts, and the fruit had been stacked and kept on the premises as shown in the evidence, with Pace as custodian for the bank, there would then have been the simple question whether the pledgee had been placed in actual exclusive possession and control. Instead of actual possession the bank claims to have obtained symbolic possession by virtue of the warehouse receipts; but these receipts can have no virtue, unless the warehouse company had the same actual and exclusive possession and dominion which would have been essential to the protection of the bank, if it had acted independently in reliance on the goods instead of on the receipts.

[23] In re Spanish-American Cork Products Co. (C. C. A.) 2 F.(2d) 203, 204, the company, desiring to borrow money from a bank, leased a portion of its premises to one of its employees; and there, in care of the employee as agent for the bank, was stored under lock and key the cork intended to be pledged, the doors having a placard, reading "Property of A. E. Nichol, Agent." The custodian had general instructions from the bank to receive payments in its behalf and release cork; and as payments were made he supervised removal of the quantity released. Upon the trial of an issue between the trustee in bankruptcy of the cork company and the bank, the district court decided that the bank had not the possession necessary to a pledge, and the decree was affirmed on appeal. The court expressed its views in the following language: "All authorities agree that possession is necessary to the validity of a pledge. The necessary indication of possession varies, of course, according to the nature and bulk and situation of the property. The rule is the pledgee must either have actual exclusive possession of the property, or if it remains on the pledgor's premises he must so separate and mark it as to give notice of his possession to the public, who might deal with the pledgor on the faith of it. In this case the cork was in the building occupied by the bankrupt, engaged in the cork business. Those who dealt with it had a right to assume in the absence of notice that the stock of cork carried in the building for use in the business was the property of the company which was using it. There was nothing on the outside to put anybody on inquiry. The public dealing with the cork company or interested in it could not be required to search for notice of some other ownership of the stock of cork by making an obtrusive and prying inspection of the inside of the cork company's premises to find and inquire the meaning of the signs of agency of one of the bankrupt's employees. There is no binding nor well-considered case that goes to that length. It is the duty of the pledgee to make such segregation and marks as will indicate his possession to business men of ordinary prudence dealing with the pledgor in the ordinary course of business."

What is there said concerning a transaction directly with a pledgee applies with equal force to a transaction through the medium of a "field warehouseman."

[24] In the discussion in which we have indulged, we are not to be understood as intimating any opinion upon the question whether the circumstances in evidence do, or do not, show a change of possession satisfying the law. As is said in Byrnes v. Moore, 93 Cal. 393, 394, 29 P. 70: "Every case of the kind here involved has its own peculiar features, and must be determined on the particular facts which surround the given transaction or transfer." We hold merely that the circumstances are not such that it can be said absolutely as a matter of law that there was an actual, open, visible, and unequivocal change of possession. The plaintiff was therefore entitled to the submission of the facts to the jury for their verdict on this point under appropriate instructions as to the rules of law by which they should be guided.

The judgment is reversed as to all the defendants.

MacLEOD v. LONG, Mayor, et al.
Civ. 141.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District,
California.
Dec. 10, 1930.

1. Municipal corporations ⇨ 205, 206.

Riverside board of public utilities held without power to employ accountant to audit books of water and light departments (St. 1907, p. 1277).

St. 1907, p. 1277, gives board of public utilities of city of Riverside exclusive control and management of city-owned public utilities, but gives auditor entire charge and control of records, books, documents and accounts of department of public utilities. It also authorizes mayor to have books of all departments audited by persons appointed by him, expense to be paid out of general fund.

2. Mandamus ⇨ 168(2).

On application for peremptory writ of mandate, burden is on plaintiff to show duty to perform act sought to be compelled (Code Civ. Proc. § 1085).

S. Mandamus ☞ 168(2).

That alternative writ of mandate requires defendants to perform act required, or show cause, does not shift burden of proof to defendants.

Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; G. R. Freeman, Judge.

Petition by A. D. MacLeod, doing business under the name of MacLeod, MacFarlane & Co., for writ of mandate against Joseph S. Long, as Mayor of the City of Riverside and President of the Board of Public Utilities of said city and others. From an order granting motion to quash petition and dismissing the proceedings, plaintiff appeals.

CARY, P. J.

Plaintiff filed a petition against the defendants Joseph S. Long as mayor of the city of Riverside and president of the board of public utilities of said city; H. W. Pierson, as auditor of said city, and Harry N. Dunbar, as treasurer of said city, praying that the defendant mayor and the defendant auditor be commanded to issue, sign, countersign and deliver to plaintiff two warrants upon the treasury of said city, one directing the treasurer to pay out of the funds of the water department the sum of $4,350.65 as authorized by resolution of the board of public utilities of said city, and the other to pay a like sum out of the funds of the electric light department of said city. The defendants filed both general and special demurrers to the petition and also motions to quash. The motions to quash were granted, the proceedings dismissed, and from the order thus made plaintiff appeals.

The petition in substance alleges that the department of public utilities of the city of Riverside is under the control of the board of public utilities consisting of five commissioners, including the mayor; that the electric light department and the water department of said city are subdepartments of the department of public utilities; that on November 16, 1928, said board of public utilities entered into an agreement with plaintiff employing him to make a complete audit of the books of both the electric light and the water departments; that between November 16, 1928, and February 8, 1929, plaintiff did make such audit and duly performed all the conditions required by said contract; that the total amount due plaintiff by reason thereof was the sum of $23,716.25; that certain progress payments having theretofore been made by said board, plaintiff on February 8, 1929, presented to said board a final audit, together with his claim for services rendered between January 24, 1929, and February 7, 1929, and amounting to $8,701.30, the same being approved by the superintendent of the board of public utilities and by the auditor of the city; that said claim was duly approved by the board of public utilities and said approval indorsed thereon by the then mayor as president of said board and ordered paid, 50 per cent. out of water department funds and 50 per cent. out of electric light department funds, and warrants were ordered drawn; that thereafter defendant Long was, at a recall election, duly elected mayor of said city and thereafter plaintiff demanded of said defendant Long and the auditor of said city that they issue, sign and countersign these warrants and deliver same to plaintiff, but that each has refused so to do.

Defendants confine their objections to the sufficiency of this petition to three points: (1) That the board had no power to appoint an accountant; (2) that it had no power to allow a claim for such work, and (3) that such claim could not be paid from the funds of the light or water departments.

The charter of the city of Riverside in effect at the time is to be found in the 1907 statutes, page 1277. The powers of the several officers and boards, in so far as pertinent to the questions here presented, are as follows: The board of public utilities consists of the mayor and four commissioners appointed by him. It has exclusive control and management of all city-owned public utilities, including the sale and distribution of electricity, water, etc., produced therefrom; except as otherwise provided by charter regarding the city auditor his deputies and clerks, it may appoint and fix the compensation of all persons employed by said department; it shall fix annually, subject to the approval of the council, the rates to be charged for light, water, etc.; all money received by the board shall be paid over daily to the city treasurer and deposited to the credit of the electric fund; the money from said fund shall be paid out only on demands approved first by the superintendent and by the city auditor and then by vote of not less than three members of the board, which fact shall be indorsed on the demand by the mayor as president of the board; no money from this fund shall be paid for any purpose except necessary expenses of conducting the department and making improvements and additions to the plant or plants; the board shall also possess such other powers as may be necessary to carry out any of the duties prescribed.

The auditor is the general accountant and fiscal agent of the city and shall exercise superintendence over all officers and employees of the city charged with the receipt of city revenues; he shall keep under his direct control all financial records, books and accounts of the departments, boards and officers of the city (with the exception of certain enumerated officers not material to the case at bar); monthly and annual reports shall be made by him of each department to the council; his authority over such records of each department, the manner of keeping same and the control of the deputies and clerks engaged in such work shall be paramount and not subject to the authority of the board at the head of such department; he "shall have entire charge and control of all records, books, documents and accounts relating to property and the receipts and expenditures and all accounts of purchases and sales of" the department of public utilities; he shall make a complete inventory of all property belonging to that department and keep it posted up to date; he shall accurately apportion all income and expenditures of that department so that "operating expenses, repairs, betterments, extensions, replacements, depreciation, cost of operation, power and fuel, the income from various sources and the net income and real value of the plant can always accurately be told."

The mayor is given general supervision over all departments and charged with the duty of seeing that they are honestly conducted. It shall be his duty to have the books of all departments pertaining to finances of the city audited by a competent person annually, and he may at any time investigate, through persons appointed by him, the accounts of any department. The expense therefor shall be paid out of the general fund.

The common council of the city have the power to investigate any department of the city government. The mayor and council together shall have the power to manage and control the city's finances, examine accounts against the city and allow or reject them, and to do all other acts required by the charter or incidental to any power conferred upon them.

[1] Plaintiff concedes that the board has no express power to employ plaintiff, but contends that such power is implied, since it is necessary to the exercise of certain powers expressly granted to the board, to wit, the exclusive management and control of all city-owned public utilities and the determination of the rates to be charged the city for street lighting. Plaintiff argues that these matters require intimate knowledge of the income of the department and the requirement for improvements, that the board certainly cannot be expected to gather this data personally, nor should it be compelled to accept and rely upon data furnished by the auditor, since he is not responsible to the board and they have no control over him, and, therefore, having the implied power to employ plaintiff to audit the accounts of the department, the claim was properly payable from the funds of the electric and water departments.

It will be observed that, by the express mandate of the charter, the keeping of the books, accounts and records of the public utilities department has been taken out of the hands of the public utility board and placed under the supervision of the city auditor, whose control in these matters is expressly declared to be paramount. Such matters as cost finding, figuring depreciation, maintenance charges, etc., are therefore no part of the work of the board. The functions of the board of public utilities are confined to the operation, upkeep, improvement and extension of the physical properties and the fixing of rates, subject in the latter instance to the approval of the common council. To hold, therefore, that because the city auditor, whose duty it is under the charter to furnish this data, is not under the control of the board the board should not be required to accept such data from him, but instead should have the implied power to have their own audit made, would at once do violence to the clear intent of the charter. The very purpose of an audit is to get an unprejudiced report on the exact condition of affairs. The board of public utilities are charged with the duty of collecting the revenues of the public utility department. Therefore, the wisdom of the framers of the charter in placing in the hands of one over whom the board has no power or control the duty of auditing their accounts is quite apparent. Furthermore, the charter expressly provides methods by which, should the executive or legislative heads of the city desire an investigation of the conditions of the public utilities department, the same may be procured and the expense thereof charged to the general fund of the city. This itself is another clear expression of the intention of the framers of that document to put such additional investigation in the hands of the mayor and the common council.

Plaintiff argues that the activities of the board of public utilities are proprietary and not governmental in their nature, and hence that the powers of the board should not be strictly construed. Assuming, without deciding such to be the rule, yet here the charter provisions are so plain that to hold the board to have the powers asserted would at once do violence to the plan set up in the charter.

[2, 3] Plaintiff contends that on a motion to quash, the lack of power of the board to enter into such a contract cannot be questioned, but that it is a matter of proof to be shown by the defendant. In support of this contention he cites Brown v. Board of Education, 103 Cal. 531, 534, 535, 37 P. 503; Morgan v. Board of Education, 136 Cal. 245, 246, 68 P. 703, and Doland v. Clark, 143 Cal. 176, 76 P. 958. But in each of these cases plaintiff, instead of applying for a writ of mandate, had sued the defendant on a contract which was presumably within the power of the defendant to make. In the case at bar, however, we are considering an application for a peremptory writ of mandate. Such form of proceeding must be predicated upon the existence of a duty on the part of defendants to perform an act concerning which they have no right to refuse (Code Civ. Proc. § 1085). The burden is, therefore, upon the plaintiff to prove the existence of such right rather than upon the defendants to disprove the same. The fact that the alternative writ is couched in the usual language, to the effect that the defendants either perform the act required or show cause before the court why they have not done so, by no means shifts the burden of proof from the shoulders of the plaintiff to those of the defendants.

The order is affirmed.

In action for attorney's fees, court's implied finding in denial of new trial that juror was not prejudiced against attorney held supported.

The affidavits in support of and opposed to the motion for new trial, based on ground that one of jurors was prejudiced against attorney, were conflicting, and it appeared that the verdict was that of eleven of the jurors.

6. Jury ⇨131(4).

Counsel, in action for attorney's fees, held not unreasonably restricted in examination of jurors.

It appeared that the court first examined the juror, and then requested that counsel refrain from asking questions covering same ground, and the record did not disclose that the court refused to permit any competent questions respecting jurors' qualifications.

7. Witnesses ⇨267.

In action by assignee of attorney's fees to recover such fees, extent of cross-examination of attorney who performed services held within court's discretion.

8. Witnesses ⇨268(1).

In action by assignee of attorney's fees to recover such fees, court's discretion in permitting cross-examination of attorney rendering services held not abused.

Action by the West Coast Securities Company against Kate Kilbourn, also known as Mrs. C. M. Kilbourn. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals.

Howard Harron, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

This action was brought by an assignee to recover for services alleged to have been rendered by an attorney, and for sums expended in connection with the employment.

The complaint alleged that the defendant and the assignor entered into an agreement providing in substance for the employment of the latter to collect a mortgage owned by defendant, it being agreed that the attorney should pay all necessary costs and expenses and receive as compensation for his services one-half of all sums collected in excess of $15,000, or, if the property should upon foreclosure be bid in by the parties to the agreement, and afterwards sold for a sum exceeding the above amount, the attorney should receive such excess. It was further alleged that, as the result of the attorney's services, the title to the mortgaged property became vested in the defendant, and it was then agreed that, in lieu of other compensation, the latter should pay and the attorney receive the sum of $1,000, together with the expense previously incurred in the sum of $205, these sums to be paid as soon as defendant procured a loan of $6,000 upon the property, that the attorney attempted to negotiate the loan, but defendant then decided to sell the property, stating that the sum of $7,500 was the most she could procure therefor, whereupon it was agreed that, in the event of a sale for this amount, the attorney should accept the sum of $500 for his services. That defendant subsequently sold the property for $12,500, but refused to pay any part of the attorney's claim.

The suit was for $1,000 attorney's fees, less $100 collected by the attorney from another source, and which it was alleged defendant agreed should be applied on account, and the sum of $205, expended as above alleged—a total of $1,105.

The defenses were in substance as follows: The execution of the agreement first alleged was admitted, but any other agreement was denied. It was alleged that defendant subsequently offered to pay the attorney $1,000 as a fee, and such further sums, not exceeding $250, as he proved were necessarily expended under the contract, provided he procured a loan of $6,000 on the property; that this offer was not accepted, but later, being advised by the attorney that the contract bound her to hold the land until he procured a purchaser, she requested him to name the amount which he would accept for a cancellation thereof in the event she should sell the property, and that he agreed to accept the sum of $1,250; that she was misled by the attorney as to the effect of the contract, as his rights thereunder had then lapsed. The alleged payment of $100 on account was also denied; it being claimed that the amount was obtained from defendant by duress.

The action was tried by a jury, which returned a verdict for the defendant. A motion for a new trial was denied, and the plaintiff has appealed from the judgment.

As grounds for the appeal, it is contended that, due to the prejudice of a certain juror, plaintiff was denied a fair trial; that the court improperly restricted the examination of the jurors on their voir dire, and that certain questions asked by the court and counsel for the defendant with respect to the execution of the contract were erroneous and prejudicial.

Upon the examination of the jurors, the court addressed certain questions to one of the jurors, who was asked if he knew the attorney mentioned, also whether he ever had litigation with an attorney, or if the fact that the suit was being prosecuted in favor of an attorney would prejudice him in any way. These questions were answered in the negative. Thereupon the court asked the juror who is claimed to have been prejudiced whether he had heard the above questions and the answers thereto. The reply being in the affirmative, the following question was asked and answer given: "Q. If these same questions were asked you, would you give the answers heretofore given? A. Yes, sir." No questions in this connection were asked by plaintiff's counsel. According to the affidavit of one of the attorneys for the plaintiff filed in support of the motion for a new trial, the juror last mentioned stated after the trial that "he felt that all lawyers were tricksters"; that "he knew this personally and vividly because it had just happened to him. A tricky lawyer back east had cheated him out of some $2,500." According to the affidavit, the juror also related other instances wherein he claimed attorneys had conducted themselves dishonestly, further stating that he wanted nothing to do with law or lawyers.

[1, 2] The foregoing, if true, indicated that the juror was not unprejudiced; and it has been held that, where a person is prejudiced against a class of persons, he is not a proper juror in a case where one of that class is interested (Lawlor v. Linforth, 72 Cal. 205, 13 P. 496; Lombardi v. California Street Ry. Co., 124 Cal. 311, 57 P. 66), and, if he gives false answers on his voir dire, a new trial should be granted (People v. Galloway, 202 Cal. 81, 259 P. 332).

In reply to the above, however, counsel for the defendant made affidavit that he also interviewed the same juror, who stated that the matters set forth in the affidavit of plaintiff's counsel were in most particulars untrue; that what the juror said to the latter was "that there were two classes of lawyers; that he had no use for shyster lawyers, but that he had no prejudice as a juror against any lawyer recovering for any honorable and proper service, and that he correctly answered every question propounded to him as to his qualifications as a juror."

[3-5] As held in Doak v. Bruson, 152 Cal. 17, 91 P. 1001, in the consideration of an appeal from an order which is based upon affidavits and which involves the decision of a question of fact, this court is bound by the same rule that controls where oral testimony is presented for review. If there is any conflict in the affidavits, those in favor of the prevailing party must be taken as true; and, as error is not presumed and all intendments are in favor of the action of the lower court, the affidavits in behalf of the successful party are to be deemed not only to establish the facts directly stated therein, but all facts which may be reasonably inferred from those directly stated. All presumptions are in favor of an order granting or denying a new trial, and the burden is upon appellant to make it affirmatively appear that the order complained of is erroneous. Here it appears that the verdict was that of eleven of the jurors; and we cannot say that the implied conclusion of the trial court that the juror was not prejudiced, and that his answers on his voir dire were true, is unsupported.

[7, 8] Counsel for the defendant was permitted to cross-examine the attorney at length with respect to the circumstances under which he was employed and the contract executed. The court also asked numerous questions on the same subject. The extent of such examination is within the sound discretion of the trial court (Neal v. Neal, 58 Cal. 287; Silverar v. Hansen, 77 Cal. 579, 20 P. 136), and we cannot say that there was an abuse of discretion in the present case; nor does the record reasonably support the contention that the attitude of defendant's counsel in conducting the cross-examination was such as to prejudice the jury against the witness.

[9] Plaintiff contends that the attorney's version of the transaction was strongly corroborated and should have been believed. There was however, evidence to the contrary, which, if believed by the jury, was sufficient to support their verdict. The question of the credibility of witnesses was exclusively for the jury's determination (Code Civ. Proc. § 1847); and, where the evidence is conflicting, or though there be no conflict, if the evidence is reasonably subject to different inferences, the conclusion reached by the jury cannot be disturbed on appeal. MacDermot v. Hayes, 175 Cal. 95, 170 P. 616; Whitelaw v. McGilliard, 179 Cal. 349, 176 P. 679.

The verdict was fairly sustained by the evidence, and no error is shown which would justify a reversal of the judgment.

The judgment is affirmed.

GALLENTINE v. FIERRO.

Civ. 320.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District,
California.

Dec. 10, 1930.

1. Death ☞85.

In action for injuries causing death plaintiff is limited in recovery to pecuniary loss suffered by him.

2. Evidence ☞12.

Courts take judicial notice of mortality tables in common use.

3. Death ☞99(1).

$5,000 for death of common laborer 59 years old, earning from $85 to $100 per month, held not excessive.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; Frank Lamberson, Judge.

Action by Myrtle Gallentine against E. Fierro. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals.

Judgment modified, and, as modified, affirmed.

Bryce P. Gibbs, of Los Angeles, and Barry J. Colding, Theodore Hale, and Carroll B. Crawford, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

J. A. Chase and Leroy McCormick, both of Visalia, for respondent.

WARMER, Justice pro tem.

This case was tried without a jury. The court found in favor of the plaintiff, and judgment was entered for $12,760. J. M. Gallentine and plaintiff were husband and wife. On the 30th day of November, 1929, while a passenger in the automobile of one George Harris, J. M. Gallentine was injured in a collision between the automobiles of the said Harris and the defendant, and as a result of said injuries the said Gallentine died. The deceased and plaintiff had been married about 35 years. Deceased was 59 years of age at the time of his death, a common laborer, earning from $85 to $100 per month. The sole question presented on this appeal is, Did the court err in finding that defendant had been damaged in the sum of $12,760, which appellant claims to be excessive? Since the filing of the briefs on appeal, the plaintiff respondent herein, has filed a consent that the judgment may be reduced from $12,760 to $5,000. The question therefore now presented is, Would a finding of damages in the sum of $5,000 be excessive? In Zibbell v. Southern Pacific Railway Co., 160 Cal. 237, at page 254, 116 P. 513, 520, the court says: "It has been decided by this court that the only means of discovering the existence of passion and prejudice as influencing a verdict is by comparing the amount of the verdict with the evidence before the trial court. To say that a verdict has been influenced by passion and prejudice is but another way of saying that the verdict exceeds any amount justified by the evidence."

[1-3] Again in Diller v. Northern California Power Co., 162 Cal. 531, 536, 123 P. 359, 361, Ann. Cas. 1913D, 908, the Court uses the following language: "In actions for injuries causing death, the plaintiffs are, of course, limited in their recovery to the pecuniary loss suffered by them." Taylor v. Western Pacific R. R. Co., 45 Cal. 323; Munro v. Dredging Co., 84 Cal. 515, 24 P. 303, 18 Am. St. Rep. 248. Under the rule announced in Dickinson v. Southern Pacific Co., 172 Cal. 727, at page 730, 158 P. 183, the courts take judicial notice of mortality tables in common use. Appellants, by using the American Experience Table of Mortality, fix the life expectancy of J. M. Gallentine, the deceased, at 14½ years, and earnestly urge that under all the facts presented the finding was excessive. In view of the consent to reduction of judgment filed herein, it would accomplish no useful purpose to determine that question. In the case at bar we cannot say that a judgment for $5,000 under all the circumstances in the case is in any way disproportionate to the damage suffered.

The judgment will be reduced by consent of plaintiff to the sum of $5,000 and, as so modified, is affirmed.

THOMPSON v. FIFTH & HILL BLDG. CO.
Civ. 6053.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 1, California.
Dec. 9, 1930.

1. Sales ⇨441(2).

Evidence held insufficient to show that seller expressly warranted special boiler as adequate for buyer's building, justifying recovery of purchase price.

2. Sales ⇨273(5).

Statute setting up warranty that article ordered for particular purpose is reasonably fit therefor held inapplicable to special boiler, complying with buyer's specifications (Civ. Code, § 1770).

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John L. Hudner, Judge.

Action by Alfred H. Thompson against the Fifth and Hill Building Company. Judgment for plaintiff and defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

Ben S. Hunter and James Farraher, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Otto & Linn, Paul J. Otto, Roy A. Linn, and Roy C. Kaiser, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HOLLZER, Justice pro tem.

Plaintiff brought this action to recover the purchase price of a certain boiler, also certain additional equipment and for the cost of certain extra labor. Judgment was rendered against defendant in favor of plaintiff as prayed for. The defendant attacks only that portion of the judgment which held that the latter was liable for the price of said boiler.

It is admitted that the defendant gave to the plaintiff an order reading as follows:

"Fifth and Hill Building, 448 So. Hill Street,
"5th & Hill Building Company, Owner,
"Charles G. Andrews Company, Agents,
"714-719 Pacific Mutual Building,
Los Angeles,

"5-11-25

"Thompson Boiler Works, 1000 N. Broadway,
Los Angeles, Calif.

"Gentlemen: Please furnish and deliver one twenty-five horse power high pressure steam boiler, to be assembled in the kitchen room in the Pershing Square Building at Fifth and Hill Streets.

"The above boiler is to be furnished complete as shown and described, i. e., boiler drum, boiler base, doors, door springs, boiler top, five flanges riveted on boiler for wash-out openings, fitted with two-inch nipples and caps, Thompson vacuum gas burners, safety valve, steam gauge, steam gauge testing cock, steam gauge syphon, water gauge, cocks, gauge glass and rods, Thompson automatic gas regulator, valves and fittings, Boiler subject to 200 pound hydrostatic pressure test; for the sum of Nine Hundred-fifty dollars ($950.00) complete, less fifteen per cent. (15%).

"Respectfully,

"Thomas Foss, Resident Manager."

It is also conceded that the boiler described in the above-mentioned order was delivered and installed as specified in said order, and that payment therefor has not been made.

[1] In its answer the defendant pleaded as a special defense that plaintiff warranted this boiler as being of sufficient size to care for the needs of the defendant's building, and that the boiler failed to meet those needs. This contention is virtually the only issue involved upon this appeal.

The trial court found that the allegations of said special defense were not proven. Our examination of the record convinces us that the lower court was warranted in making this finding.

The letter written by plaintiff to defendant a short time prior to giving of the order previously mentioned, and which appellant claims constituted an express warranty, related to a different boiler. Furthermore, the evidence clearly showed that the defendant's engineer examined a boiler similar to the one specified in its order, and it was only after such examination that said order was prepared and given to plaintiff.

[2] Appellant makes the further contention that if this prior letter did not constitute an express warranty then at least there was an implied warranty to the effect that this boiler would reasonably fit a particular purpose, to wit, the needs of its building. In support of this argument defendant cites section 1770 of the Civil Code, which reads as follows: "One who manufactures an article under an order for a particular purpose, warrants by the sale that it is reasonably fit for that purpose."

There is no merit in this point. As observed in the case of Bancroft v. San Francisco Tool Company, 120 Cal. 228, 52 P. 496, 498: "This section [Civ. Code § 1770] is but the restatement of an elementary principle of law, and does not apply where the manufactured article is furnished under a contract demanding that it be made according to specific plans and specifications; for under such circumstances the purchaser selects the article, and gets exactly what he orders, and, in the absence of an express warranty, assumes the risk following such purchase. * * * 1 Pars. Cont. 586, declares the rule as follows: ' * * It [the principle of implied warranty] must, however, be limited to cases where a thing is ordered for a special purpose, and not applied to those where a special thing is ordered, although this be intended for a special purpose; for, if the thing is itself specifically selected and ordered, there the purchaser takes upon himself the risk of its effecting its purpose.'"

This construction of the Code section in question was reaffirmed in the decision of Remsberg v. Hackney Mfg. Co., 174 Cal. 799, 164 P. 792, 794, wherein the Supreme Court cited with approval the case of Bancroft v. San Francisco Tool Co., supra, saying: "This doctrine is supported by a wealth of authority."

Similarly, in the action at bar, the defendant selected a special kind of boiler and obtained exactly what it ordered, and hence became liable for the purchase price thereof.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

WILLIAMS et al. v. MYERS et al.

Civ. 241.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District,
California.

Dec. 5, 1930.

1. Appeal and error ⇨1010(1).

If evidence supporting findings is substantial, the finding will be deemed sufficiently supported.

2. Appeal and error ⇨930(1).

Evidence tending to support finding must be accepted as true with all inferences which might reasonably have been thought by trial court to lead to same conclusion.

3. Fraud ⇨58(1).

In action for fraud in exchange of land, evidence held to support finding as to representations of value, and that they were representations of fact.

4. Fraud ⇨22(1).

Parties to exchange of land held not deprived of right to rely on other party's representations of value by investigation made.

Plaintiffs conveyed land in Southern California to defendants in exchange for lands in South Dakota. Plaintiffs wrote to a bank to which they were referred by defendants regarding defendants' land, but received very indefinite information. They also wired a "Commercial Club" and received an answer, purporting to be from such club, although there was no such club. One of plaintiffs wrote defendant that they had been unable to get information about his land and was relying on his truthfulness. Defendant urged haste in consummation of trade.

5. Appeal and error ⇨1008(1).

Question whether representation of value of land was representation of fact was for trial court, whose determination was binding on appellate court.

6. Fraud ⇨22(1).

For investigation by party to exchange of land to preclude reliance on other party's representations, it must be free and untrammelled.

7. Contracts ⇨94(1).

Fraud ⇨18.

One false material representation is sufficient for action for rescission of contract or action for fraud if such that contract would not have been entered into without it.

8. Fraud ⇨18.

Representation of value of land exchanged held such that contract would not have been entered into without it.

9. Fraud ⇨58(4).

Evidence held to support finding that parties to exchange of land relied on other party's representations.

10. Appeal and error ⇨925(2).

When record shows no testimony or action of trial court relative to issue, except finding made, it must be assumed there was no proof.

11. Pleading ⇨126.

Traverse in terms of allegation held admission that soil was hardpan, gumbo, and adobe, and simply to deny that it was chiefly of that character.

Plaintiffs alleged lands exchanged were represented as consisting of good soil, free from hardpan, gumbo, adobe, and stones, etc. Defendants merely denied that land consisted of soil largely composed of hardpan, gumbo, or adobe, and which could not be cropped and cultivated with profit and success, and denied that more than 120 acres were worthless for cultivation or consisted of hardpan, gumbo, adobe, etc.

12. Fraud ⇨18.

Land represented to be free from hardpan, gumbo, adobe, or stones, need not be chiefly of that character to render representation false and material.

13. Trial ⇨388(4).

Admission in answer that land exchanged was hardpan, gumbo, and adobe supports judgment, and no finding is necessary.

14. Fraud ⇨18.

Representation that soil of land exchanged was free from hardpan, gumbo, adobe, and stone was material.

15. Appeal and error ⇨382(5).

Where both defendants relied upon answer filed, neither can claim on appeal that there should have been separate answers.

16. Appeal and error ⇨916(1).

Where no evidence appears in record as to allegations in effect admitted, it will be assumed trial court treated allegations as admitted.

17. Pleading ⇨36(6).

Admission in answer that land represented to contain no hardpan, gumbo, and adobe did contain soil of that character supported judgment as against defendant not shown to have made any representations.

18. Fraud ⇨49.

Answer held to raise no issue as to lands being of value alleged if as represented.

Complaint in action for fraud alleged that lands as represented would have been worth $80,200. Answer denied that the lands "would have been worth, except in trade, the sum of $80,200 had they been as represented."

19. Appeal and error ⇨679(1).

Appellants, claiming benefit of rule that allegations will be deemed sufficiently traversed when court tried issue without objection, must show by record that court did so.

Action by F. J. Williams and others against Roscoe A. Myers and another. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal.

WARMER, Justice pro tem.

The appeal herein is from a judgment for damages in an action for fraud. The action was tried by the court sitting without a jury. The complaint charges fraud. The transaction involves an exchange of real and personal property in Riverside county, Cal., for real and personal property in the county of Corson, S. D. There are a number of specifications of fraud pleaded in the complaint; first, as to the value of the land in South Dakota; second, that the defendants could then and there have sold the same for a greater sum than is alleged to have been fraudulently represented to be its value; third, conditions of the farmhouse and outbuildings; fourth, number of acres under cultivation, character of soil, as being free from hardpan, gumbo, adobe, and stones, etc.; fifth, productivity of the soil; sixth, number of acres actually being cultivated and as to the number of acres capable of cultivation; also, that for the purpose of deceiving plaintiffs, defendants entered into a conspiracy with one Robert H. Jackson, cashier of the Security State Bank of McIntosh, S. D., to deceive and defraud plaintiffs by representing to them a false value of the said premises. The Security State Bank was given by the defendants as a reference as to the value of said lands. The answer assumes to deny the allegations of fraud, and in addition thereto sets up a claim of fraud as against the plaintiffs as to the property they conveyed to the said defendants. An objection as to the sufficiency of the answer is urged by the plaintiffs, claiming that the answer fails to deny many of the allegations of the complaint setting forth the fraud claimed. Inasmuch as most, if not all, of the negotiations in this transaction were by mail, we will quote from some of the correspondence.

R. A. Myers wrote Williams on December 3, 1923, as follows:

"I am sending you a list of my farms for trade, and might state that all of these farms are rented for 1924, and are and have been good investments. Now you will see that it takes quite a while to get a letter down to you and one back, hence I am going to be frank and to the point, with you and am pricing my farms down to what you will get from either of the following Appraisal Boards, Miller and Miller of Watauga, S. D. and I might state that this is a small town just to the west of our town here on the Yellowstone trail, and these men had a mortgage at one time on two of these Farms, so they know the value. Also Streagel Abstract and Appraisal Co., McIntosh, S. D. Now here is the point I cannot trade these farms for inflated land in the Perris Valley as I can trade for almost anything up the Valley. I was in Perris and up to San Jacinto, and in fact spent the winter of 1921 and 22 in Southern Cal. But I will say that if your price is not inflated, this looks the best of any deal I have seen and nearer to my liken.

"Please send price, rather the personal property is Mtg. of not and rather the real estate is Mtg. If Mrtage is very large I would not be interested, as I do not care to trade of a big Mtg. I would suggest if you are interested to send me a complete inventory of personal property and explain everything in full, and upon receipt of your next letter I will know as rather or not I will be interested and if I am I have a friend in the Bank at Los Angeles that will go at once and look over the place with you.

"My land is all clear and if they have a Mtg. on there land I can assume there Mtg. and take back the same amount, if we get together on the land I trade them, the following is the list.

"160 acre farm $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles from town on a fine main road, telephone and rural route, nice farm house all finished and good barn, good well and windmill, all fenced and 100 acres in crop each year and balance Hay and Pasture land this farm is every foot tillable, and of the best of soil. This is rented for next year, and is sure a nice place, Price—\$20,000.00.

"160 acre farm $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles from town on the Yellowstone trail, has a very fine large 10 room house, a dandy, two barns, all kinds of sheds and grainerys, three wells and windmill and tank. Fenced and 120 acres in crop each year. Balance is hay and pasture land. This is a very highly improved farm as the house could not be built at this time for less than \$7000.00. Price \$20,000.00.

"320 acre farm $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles from town 80 acre in crop each year and balance of this land is used for Hay purposes and sure get a good return each year. No buildings whatsoever. Price \$20,200.00.

"320 acre farm 4 miles from town on a good road in a fine neighborhood. Always rented 300 acres of the finest tillable land and always rented and is rented for 1924. All fenced but no buildings; a small creek cuts off one corner, and provides water for the stock the year round, and is one of the best farms I have and is always in demand. Price $20,000.

"All of these farms lay on the finest roads we have here in Dakota, and they are without exception well located and in one of the best farming countries in the Middle West.

"Please let me know as soon as possible Mr. Williams, and if your parties really want to get out and will be fair with me, I am sure we can deal as my lands will stand up under any inspection and are worth every cent I ask, and in 1919 if I had had sense enough to sell I could have sold for much more.

"I want the Ranch just as it is all stocked and ready for me to go on too as this is just what I was looking for. Thanks for the remembering me on the deal. I am. Yours resp. R. A. Myers."

Williams wrote Myers on December 8, 1923:

"I am in receipt of yours of the 3rd inst. and note what you say as to your holdings. * * * Now the ranch fully equipped will appraise at from 120 to 125,000 I believe.

"The cattle and personal property will be about $26,000, from a sales standpoint and would possibly cost 35,000 to replace. * * * It is not located in the Perris Valley and not to be so considered at all.

"It is in what is known as the San Jacinto or Hemet Valley where conditions are entirely different.

"I am not trying to discourage or encourage but only wish to place the facts before you as near as I can. * * *

"Unless you can put in some cash there would be no use to even bother. Cattle and personal property here is cash spot, * * * etc.

On December 10, 1923, Mr. Williams wrote Myers:

"Have talked over matters with all interested parties and unless you can raise a reasonable amt. of cash it will be impossible.

"I believe I can arrange to take in about 75,000 of your holdings on strict appraisal, no other way, as that is only way you can negotiate same courtesy of fairness on this property as I wrote you the other day. The balance must be cash and mortgage. * * *

"My advice to you is to get the first train and come out here and if it is possible to figure your way get ranch or deal signed up subject to our parties investigating yours which will all be done from here by Realty Board or others. I am of course interested and am willing to take my interest in Dak. but I will have more or less difficulty in handling others as one of interested parties requires all cash which I must arrange for. * * *

Williams again wrote Myers January 3, 1924:

"Have had a final discussion regarding offer with all interested parties. Now if your land will stand up on appraisal of bank there or other competent source I believe a deal can be made as follows:

"180 acres including all improvements, machinery, tools and equipment belonging to ranch and one or two teams of horses subject to $12,500 3 years, to include crops on land—for your lands as per your letter free and clear."

Myers wrote Williams January 7, 1924, in part as follows:

"Your letter of the 1st of this month rec. today and am answering everything in full so there will be no misunderstanding when we close up if we do. * * *

"I gave you the names of two firms in my former letter to wire or write to for appraisal price, and here is another the Security State Bank of McIntosh, S. D.

"Here is what I will do subject to inspection by self or party I send: I will trade the above places for your 180 acre ranch land, and you are to include at least 4 head of horses, one tractor in good shape and all farm machinery and milking machines, etc. * * *

"I will give warrant deed and furnish abstract showing everything clear and all taxes paid to date for my lands. Now you may wire me if expected, if you so desire, but I will consider the deal closed if you wire me as I will have to at once get the abstract Co. to make the abstracts to date which will be of great cost to me and will send all or bring them down which will cost me about 500, or more and if for any reason of yours and not mine, I will expect you to pay me damage if I come down and you don't deal. I am only telling you this so you will not misrepresent anything and we will have no trouble on the finish and will always be friends. If you wish to except and when you do if you just wire me that you except offer made by me January 7th, I will proceed to get out my deeds, come down or send them down, so the deal will go through slick as a whistle if your place is what you say. I really think you are telling the truth or I would not go to this bother. Let me know soon, as my letters will reach you the 12th and I will expect to hear from you soon after that date."

Williams wrote Myers again January 15, 1924:

"Replying to yours of the 7th inst. beg to advise we are trying to secure definite information regarding values of your lands. If same is as you state I believe a deal can be closed as follows for your lands clear. * * *

"I believe you stated you paid $105.00 per acre for 320 or 160."

On January 19, 1924, Myers wrote Williams in part as follows:

"This offer is subject to my representative inspection. $500.00 at the best I can do to get my abstracts up to date the taxes paid and then all of the other expenses besides.

"So you can wire if you except this offer but do not do so unless you are sure that all of you that are interested are satisfied, as I will be out a lot of money on your account and expect a compensation thereof; in case a change would be made by you when I come up to the requirements you expect of me, as per this letter.

"Now Mr. Williams I am frank and want you to be for I have a-One farms here and will not trade them for something that is not worth the money. * * *

"All I can say yet is dont wire me until you are perfectly satisfied with my farms and my proposition. But must be done before the first of Feb. as if I don't deal with you I am taking a Dairy Farm just out of the city of Minneapolis, and am only assuming $2500.00.

"Please wire me soon after you receive this letter, which should be the 23rd or 24th, I am,

"Yours truly, R. A. Myers."

Williams on January 21, 1924, wired Myers as follows: "If you are ready can make arrangements to close deal per my letter recent date upon wire from you will hold until February First pending your examination."

On January 22, 1924, Meyers wrote Williams in part as follows: "* * * * As per your telegram of today you are simply excepting your own offer. What I want is for you to except my offer. Please do something at once. R. A. Myers."

The court found, among other things, that the statements and representations were made by said defendants as statements of fact and not as statements of opinion and were intended by the defendants to be statements of fact and not of opinion to the plaintiffs and were so understood by them. That plaintiffs relied upon and believed each and all of said statements and were thereby induced to and did enter into the exchange of properties as in plaintiff's complaint set forth, and were thereby induced to and did execute to the defendants a deed to the property located in Riverside county and conveyed to the defendants in exchange for the South Dakota property. That in representing the value of defendants' property to plaintiffs, defendants intended to and did convey to plaintiffs the information that the prices and values named by defendants were the reasonable cash market value of said properties; that the total reasonable market value of parcel No. 1 was $5,000; that parcel No. 2 was of a total reasonable value of $11,700; parcel No. 3 of a reasonable market value of $5,400. The court further found that, had the property that was conveyed by the defendants to the plaintiffs herein been as represented, it would have been at all times of the reasonable market value of $80,200. In the condition in which said properties actually were, they were not of a value in excess of $29,500. That said lands and properties were represented by defendants to plaintiffs to be of the market value of $80,200; that the difference between the reasonable market value of said lands and the properties as so represented and as they were in fact was $50,700, and ordered judgment entered for that sum.

The record, by bill of exceptions, reveals the fact that the parties and the trial court proceeded with the trial on the theory that at least the allegations of the alleged false and fraudulent representations as to the value of the South Dakota property were sufficiently traversed, as both parties offered evidence on said issue and the court made its findings thereon from the evidence and not from any admission in the pleadings upon said alleged representation as to value. Therefore, we shall assume, without deciding as to such representation, that the issue was properly joined. Defendants, appellants herein, attack the sufficiency of the evidence to support such finding.

[1, 2] The intendments are in favor of the judgment, and, if the evidence in support of the findings is substantial either with or without conflict, the finding will be deemed sufficiently supported. Hind v. Oriental Products Co., 195 Cal. 655, 235 P. 438; Hassell v. Bunge, 167 Cal. 365, 139 P. 800; Bancroft-Whitney Co. v. McHugh, 166 Cal. 140, 134 P. 1157; Ryder v. Bamberger, 172 Cal. 791, 158 P. 753; 2 Cal. Jur. 879, and the cases there cited. In examining the sufficiency of the questioned finding this court must accept as true all evidence tending to establish the correctness of the finding as made, taking into account as well all inferences which might reasonably have been thought by the trial court to lead to the same conclusion. Delannoy v. Quetu, 73 Cal. App. 627, 239 P. 71; Menotti v. Marchesi, 63 Cal. App. 49, 218 P. 439. The evidence as to the value of said South Dakota premises is sharply conflicting, and under the above rule we are bound to accept as true that evidence which tends to support the finding, it being necessary to point out only enough of the evidence to show that the findings found support in the evidence. Bancroft-Whitney Co. v. McHugh, supra.

[3] Myers must have known the meaning that Williams was placing upon the language used by him, because as early as December 10, 1923, Williams, in a letter of Myers, wrote: "I believe I can arrange to take in about 75,000 of your holdings on strict appraisal, no other way," and at all times during the written negotiations between these parties it was apparent that Williams was interpreting the language of Myers to mean that the prices placed upon his property in South Dakota by Myers to mean and be the market value thereof. The entire correspondence between these parties seems to appear in the record. The language used is not the most definite and certain; however, a letter appears in the record that is definite and certain and unquestionably was received by Myers prior to the consummation of this exchange, and, while there is an objection to the letter when it was offered in evidence, such objection was properly overruled. In that letter Mercedes C. Williams, one of the parties interested in the California property offered for exchange, wrote Myers on January 28, 1924:

"I believe father has told you that we are all financially interested in the ranch—that is mother, father, my brother * * * and myself.

"We have been unable to learn anything definite as to your farms. The Realty Board, whom we expected would appraise or report on your farms, have notified us that they have no facilities in that part of the country for so doing, and since none of us have ever been in South Dakota, we are forced to rely upon your statements as to values and conditions there.

"Of course, the proper thing to do at this time, would be for father to go there and learn for himself just what the farms are worth, but unfortunately he is not in a financial position to incur the expense of such a trip. Therefore, I trust you will understand just why I am writing you at this time, and realize how we are depending upon the truthfulness of your statements, if this deal is consummated.

"In your letters to father, you place a valuation of $80,200.00 on your farms. * * *

"You say the farms are worth every cent you are asking and that this is the fair and reasonable market value of the property for which you paid $105.00 per acre and could have sold for more."

After the receipt of such letter there is no possibility that Mr. Myers was not advised that the Williams were relying upon his statements as to the value, price, and worth of said farm as meaning the market value.

Such evidence is sufficient to support the finding as to the representations of value, if such representations are in fact representations as to a fact and not the mere expression of an opinion. The defendants herein urge that such representations were the mere expressions of an opinion and not the statement of a fact at all.

In Alvarez v. Brannan, 7 Cal. 503, at page 507, 68 Am. Dec. 274, the court says:

"If a party asserts that as true, which he does not know to be true, it is a false representation. If he intends simply to state his belief upon information, then he should state it in that precise form, so as to apprise the other party of the true grounds upon which his statement is made. A party will always be held to make good his statement in the form in which he makes it. If he states a thing as true in general terms without qualification, then he is presumed to do so upon his own knowledge, or at his own peril, and must make good his assertion." This rule is cited with approval in Giovannoni v. Bartmann, 59 Cal. App. at page 651, 211 P. 844.

In Crandall v. Parks, 152 Cal. 772, 774, 93 P. 1018, the court passed upon a case wherein the plaintiff was the owner of a certain land in San Diego county and the defendant was the owner of certain land in the state of Oregon. The plaintiff never saw the land in Oregon and had no knowledge of its value, nature, or quality, except the statements of defendant in regard thereto. The defendant knew this. An exchange of properties was effected, plaintiff being induced to consummate the same by reason of such representations as to value and ownership upon which he wholly relied. The court said on page 776 of 152 Cal., 93 P. 1018, 1019: "It is claimed that the representation as to the value of the Oregon land was nothing more than a mere expression of his own opinion as to the value on the part of the defendant, and therefore that an action will not lie on account thereof. This, however, is not the effect of a fair construction of the findings. A statement as to the value of property is not always made as a mere expression of opinion upon which the other party has no right to rely. It may be a positive affirmation of a fact, intended as such by the party making it, and reasonably regarded as such by the party to whom it is made. When it is such, it is like any other representation of fact, and may be a fraudulent misrepresentation warranting rescission. The rule in regard to this matter is stated by Mr. Pomeroy as follows: 'Wherever a party states a matter which might otherwise be only an opinion, and does not state it as the mere expression of his own opinion, but affirms it as an existing fact material to the transaction, so that the other party may reasonably treat it as a fact and rely and act upon it as such, then the statement clearly becomes an affirmation of fact within the meaning of the general rule, and may be a fraudulent misrepresentation.' 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 878. He further says that the statements which most frequently come within this branch of the rule are those concerning value." See also Harris v. Miller, 196 Cal. 8, 235 P. 981; Nichols v. Moore, 181 Cal. 131, 183 P. 531; Bonnarjee v. Pike, 43 Cal. App. 502, 185 P. 479; Phelps v. Grady, 168 Cal. 73, 141 P. 926; McKeever v. Locke-Paddon Co., 58 Cal. App. 51, 207 P. 1040; and Winkler v. Jerrue, 20 Cal. App. 555, 129 P. 804.

In Stockton v. Hind, 51 Cal. App. 131, at page 136, 196 P. 122, 124, the court says: "It is conceded that the general rule is that an expression of opinion or belief, if nothing more, and if so understood and intended, is not a representation of fact, and, although false, does not amount to actionable fraud. Ordinarily a person has no right to rely upon such statements, and, if he does so rely, he cannot treat them as fraudulent, either for the purpose of maintaining an action in damages for deceit, or for the purpose of rescinding the contract. Where there is any doubt as to whether or not a representation was intended and understood as a mere expression of opinion or a statement of fact, the question is one not of law but of fact for the court or jury. 20 Cyc. 15, et seq.; Spreckels v. Gorrill, 152 Cal. 395, 92 P. 1011;

[4] Defendants rely upon the rule of independent investigation. Williams wrote on January 11, 1924:

"Security State Bank, McIntosh, S. Dak.

"Gentlemen: Mr. R. A. Myers of McIntosh, requested I write you in re values of following lands and improvements (describing the South Dakota lands here in question).

"I would like to ascertain the value you place upon these lands and amounts of loan that could be had upon each parcel approximately.

"The present market value is particularly desired as well as desirability of location. * * * Kindly let me have your candid opinion," etc.

In answer thereto he received a letter from R. H. Jackson, cashier, in part as follows:

"Yours of Jan. 11th received and note contents. Regarding the R. A. Myers farms as described in your letter will say that these farms are as good a quality as in the county and on good roads from two to four miles from town. Such farms with good improvements range from $50. to $140. according to distance from town and class of improvements the lands might contain. These farms have always rented and I believe they are rented now. Loans could be gotten, but it would take time to work them through, and of course, loaning agencies expect the land to be occupied by the owner, have 25% under cultivation and milk cows."

Williams wired the Commercial Club of McIntosh on January 31, 1924, as follows: "With view locating there please wire collect present cash value R. A. Myers farm land."

Answer was sent from McIntosh February 1, 1924: "Party owns considerable land. Not acquainted with particular quarters. Land in vicinity all values. Unimproved twenty to thirty-five. Well improved quarters seventy-five to one hundred fifty. (Signed) Commercial Club."

The record discloses the fact that there was no Commercial Club in McIntosh. There was a Booster Club which was not active, but the said R. H. Jackson had been active therein some time before. Somehow the telegram was delivered to R. H. Jackson and he answered the same signing it "Commercial Club," without disclosing his identity. It will be noted that the letter from the bank was prior to the letter sent by Mercedes C. Williams to Myers, but that the telegrams were subsequent in date to said letter. This constitutes, so far as the record discloses, all the investigation or inquiry made by the Williams concerning said property. Does such inquiry preclude plaintiffs from reliance upon the representation of a value alleged and found to be fraudulent? We think not. The rule is stated by Mr. Pomeroy in his work on Jurisprudence (3d Ed.) § 893 as follows:

"If after a representation of fact, however positive, the party to whom it was made institutes an inquiry for himself, has recourse to the proper means of obtaining information, and actually learns the real facts, he cannot claim to have relied upon the misrepresentation and to have been misled by it. Such claim would simply be untrue. The same result must plainly follow when, after the representation, the party receiving it has given to him a sufficient opportunity of examining into the real facts, when his attention is directed to the sources of information, and he commences, or purports or professes to commence, an investigation. The plainest motives of expediency and of justice require that he should be charged with all the knowledge which he might have obtained had he pursued the inquiry to the end with diligence and completeness. He cannot claim that he did not learn the truth, and that he was misled." (Italics ours.)

In Neher v. Hansen, 12 Cal. App. 370, at pages 372, 373, 107 P. 565, the court says:

"No duty devolved upon plaintiff to make any investigation as to the truth of the statements. As said in Calmon v. Sarraile, 142 Cal. 638, 76 P. 486: 'Even when contracting parties are adverse to each other, either has the right to rely upon an express statement made by the other of an existing fact of which the truth is known to the other and unknown to him.' See, also, Willey v. Clements, 146 Cal. 91, 79 P. 850, and Morris v. Courtney, 120 Cal. 65, 52 P. 130, where it is said: 'And the seller cannot escape responsibility by showing that the purchaser might have ascertained that such representations were untrue.' * * *

"Conceding that plaintiff may have consulted others, or received information from others, it would not follow as a matter of law that such information was of a character to influence him in the purchase. Moreover, the giving of such an instruction would take from the jury the determination of the question as to whether or not plaintiff relied upon the representations made by defendant, and was thereby induced to buy the stock."

See, also, Shermaster v. California Home Building Loan Co., 40 Cal. App. 661, 181 P. 409; Sullivan v. Helbing, 66 Cal. App. 478, 226 P. 803; Troy Laundry Machinery Co. v. Drivers', etc., Co., 14 Cal. App. 152, 111 P. 121; Davis v. Butler, 154 Cal. 623, 98 P. 1047; and Spreckels v. Gorrill, 152 Cal. 383, 92 P. 1011.

In Blake v. Arp, 180 Cal. 144, at page 147, 179 P. 683, 684, the court says: "Appellant urges the fact that the evidence was insufficient to show any fraud on his part, for the reason, as he claims, that the plaintiff knew as much about the title as he did, and that therefore his statement was a mere expression of opinion, and cites in relation thereto the following cases: Choate v. Hyde, 129 Cal. 580, 62 P. 118, and Rheingans v. Smith, 161 Cal. 362, 365, Ann. Cas. 1913B, 1140, 119 P. 494. But the evidence does not support appellant's position. * * * Moreover, the evidence of plaintiff was that she was constantly lulled into inaction by the repeated assertion of defendant that he had the title, notwithstanding the allegations of the plaintiff in said suit."

In the case of Del Vecchio v. Savelli, 10 Cal. App. 79, 101 P. 32, the court holds that fraud is generally proved by inference from facts and circumstances and not by direct and positive proof. A single misstatement knowingly made with intent to influence another to enter into a contract will, if believed and relied upon by the other party, afford as complete a ground for relief as if it had been accompanied by a multitude of other false representations. Davis v. Butler, 154 Cal. 623, 98 P. 1047.

We are of the opinion that measured by the said rules the evidence is sufficient to sustain the finding that the representation as to value made by the defendants to the plaintiffs herein are representations of fact and not mere expressions of opinion. Measured by the rule that the property is far removed from the residence of the plaintiffs, and that the plaintiffs had no knowledge as to the same, we find that the property was halfway across the continent east and west and well toward the Northern boundary of the United States, while the plaintiffs resided in Southern California. Measured by the surrounding circumstances we find expressions used by the defendants in their correspondence with the plaintiffs such as "My land will stand up under any inspection," "an A-1 farm," "I am going to be frank and to the point," "wont trade for inflated value," reference to the Security State Bank, realty firm in neighboring town, Abstract & Appraisal Company, "now here is the point, I cannot trade these farms for inflated land in the Perris Valley as I can trade for almost anything up the valley," "I will say that if your price is not inflated," "fine buildings," "grand place," or words of such import, "could have sold for much more," "Now Mr. Williams I am frank and want you to be for I have a One farms here and will not trade them for something that is not worth the money," "really think you are telling the truth or wouldn't go to this bother," "let me hear soon," "wire me soon," "what I want is for you to except my offer," "please do something at once," and "all I can say yet is don't wire me until you are perfectly satisfied with my farms and my proposition. But must be done before the first of February as if I don't deal with you I am taking a dairy farm just out of the city of Minneapolis and am only assuming $2,500."

[5] Myers knew how to state a limitation in the language used because whenever he referred to an offer to Williams for the California property he said "subject to inspection by self or party I send." If Myers had the slightest doubt as to what was being understood by the parties, which we question, then the letter of Mercedes C. Williams must have dispelled that doubt, because she in unmistakable terms told him that any investigation Williams may have made had produced no results and they were relying upon his representations as to value as a fact; that they were financially unable to make the trip to examine his properties. This letter advised Myers that they were relying upon his representations, and, if they were not true, the deal could not be closed, as the Williams had their all in it. Blake v. Arp, supra; French v. Freeman, supra; Dow v. Swain, supra; Herdan v. Hanson, supra; Crandall v. Parks, supra. However, if there should be any possible question as to whether or not such a representation was a representation of an existing fact or not, then it was a question for the determination of the trial court. Herdan v. Hanson, supra; Stockton v. Hind, supra; Palladine v. Imperial Valley Farm Lands Association, supra. The trial court has determined the same adversely to the defendants herein. Such determination is binding upon this court.

In the instant case plaintiffs only made a nominal inquiry along the line of reference suggested by the defendants to them, the Security State Bank. The information received therefrom appears to us so indefinite and conditioned that no one could be reasonably charged with having acted upon it, or, to put it another way, such indefinite and conditioned information, if information it be, could not be said to preclude the presumption that plaintiffs relied upon the defendant's representation as to value. Neither could such information, if information it was, be said, as a matter of law, to wipe away the right to rely upon the representation of Myers as to value, to which he had pledged his faith. Dow v. Swain, page 683, of 125 Cal., 58 P. 271, supra. The evidence is undisputed that the plaintiffs had never been in South Dakota and had no information concerning it. The correspondence reveals the fact that Williams was not informed as to the true facts or any facts at all, and that Myers was continually reasserting the fact of value in his land directly or indirectly; that he (Myers) fails to comply with the rule that Williams must be given time to investigate, but rather urges plaintiffs to hurry, first by a courteous "please," then by a covert threat of loss and finally by the bald fixing of a date, February 1st, when the deal must be closed or he would trade his property for a dairy farm near the great city of Minneapolis. The constant affirmation of value in his lands in South Dakota, lulling the plaintiffs herein to trust and confidence in his representations of value, was of itself alone sufficient to keep alive the right of plaintiffs to rely upon said representations. Blake v. Arp, supra.

[6, 7] The lack of information received fails to overcome the presumption of reliance on the representations of defendants. Troy Laundry Machinery Co. v. Drivers', etc., Co., supra. The urge to haste contained in the evidence fails to comply with the rule of reasonable time to investigate. The telegram to a body nonexistent, answered as though by such body, by another, in its name, could not be said to be information from or for anyone, and could not constitute investigation. It at most was an inquiry directed to no one. Especially must this be true in the light of the letter of Mercedes C. Williams, positively declaring that they had been unable to get information upon which to act independently, and that they must and did rely upon the representations of the defendant Myers. In order for an investigation to preclude a person's right to rely upon the representations made, it must be a free and untrammelled investigation. 12 C. J. 821. We cannot say that such an inquiry precluded plaintiffs from relying upon such representation. On conflicting evidence the court found that such representation was false. It was material. One false representation of a material fact is sufficient either for an action for rescission of a contract or to sustain an action for damages for fraud. Harris v. Miller, 196 Cal. 8, 235 P. 981. The fraudulent representation must be such that the court can say that without it the contract would not have been entered into. Craig v. Shea, 45 Cal. App. 351, 188 P. 73, and cases there cited.

[8, 9] In the instant case the representation of value was the very essence of the inducing cause of the contract. The other representations pleaded even were included in it and support it. We have no hesitation in saying that such representation of value was of such a character that without it the contract would not have been entered into. Defendants then urge that there is no evidence to support the finding, and that plaintiffs rely upon such representations. We think such claim is devoid of any merit. Fraud is generally proved by inference from facts and circumstances and not by direct and positive proof. Del Vecchio v. Savelli, supra. The evidence herein was sharply conflicting, and the trial court found against the defendants. There is direct evidence which, together with the inferences from all the evidence, is abundantly sufficient to support such finding.

Plaintiffs allege, among other things, that said lands were represented as A-No. 1 farms, well improved, consisting of good soil, level, and free from hardpan, gumbo, adobe, and stones and well adapted to the raising of the usual farm crops. The denial of the above allegations in the complaint is as follows: Deny that said tract of land consisted of soil which was largely composed of hardpan, gumbo, or adobe, and which could not be cropped and cultivated with profit and success. Deny that more than 120 acres was worthless for cultivation or consisted of hardpan, gumbo, or adobe, or was unfit for cultivation, or was worthless for any purpose except pasture, or would not in ordinary years grow good hay or grass thereon, or that said lands consisted chiefly of hardpan, gumbo, or adobe soil; deny that said soil therein consisted largely of hardpan, adobe, or blowouts or buffalo wallows. The court found that as to certain of said lands the soil thereof on the south side was poor, contained gumbo, hardpan, and undersoil. As to certain other of said lands it was poor grazing land or gumbo rock land. The appellants urge as to these allegations that the trial court in fact deemed the allegation sufficiently traversed, and such cause was tried upon such a theory; therefore the objection cannot be raised for the first time on appeal. In Smithson v. Atchison, etc., Ry. Co., 174 Cal. at page 155, 162 P. 111, 114, the court said: "It is a familiar principle that, the case having been tried upon this theory without objection, neither party will be allowed to present it in this court for the first time. Tulley v. Tranor, 53 Cal. 274; Horton v. Dominguez, 68 Cal. 642, 10 P. 186; Illinois Trust & Sav. Bank v. Pacific Ry. Co., 115 Cal. 285, 297, 47 P. 60; Gervaise v. Brooks, 156 Cal. 110, 103 P. 332."

And in the case of Schuh v. R. H. Herron Co., 177 Cal. 13, 169 P. 682, 684, the following language is used: "In this case, however, the defense of contributory negligence was considered as properly pleaded throughout the trial. No objection was made at any time on the ground that it was not pleaded. A large part of the testimony on the trial was devoted to that subject, and the instructions of the court show that it was deemed a matter in issue to be submitted to the jury. Under these circumstances a defective plea cannot be made available in support of an erroneous ruling on the subject. [Citing cases.]" Also, 2 Cal. Jur. 246.

[10-14] The record discloses the fact that the trial of this cause occupied 14 days; that the bill of exceptions contains only 66 pages; that the attention of the defendants, appellants herein, was directed to a claim of insufficiency of the record to fully present the issues on appeal. The defendants' record on appeal does not show any testimony offered or rejected or any action of the trial court relative thereto except a finding made. We must therefore assume that there was no proof as to such allegation. Was any such proof necessary? We think not. The reading of the allegation and the traverse thereof admits that the soil was hardpan, gumbo, and adobe, and simply denies that the said soil was largely or chiefly of such a character. No person would even claim that, if such a representation so made was false, such a condition of the soil would have to obtain to a large portion, or the soil would have to be chiefly of such a character, to make such a representation a material one. Furthermore, the complaint charges that the false representation was that the soil was free from hardpan, gumbo, adobe, and stones, and hence, if there was any hardpan, gumbo, adobe, or stones on the said lands, the truthfulness of such an allegation is admitted. While the court's finding is somewhat more limited than the allegation, no finding was necessary. Crandall v. Parks, supra. See, also, First National Bank v. Maxwell, 123 Cal. 360, 55 P. 980, 69 Am. St. Rep. 64. Such admission comes in all its force as an ultimate fact to support the judgment to the same degree as though uncontradicted evidence supporting the allegation had been introduced and an appropriate finding thereon made. That a representation as to land being free from hardpan, gumbo, or adobe being material, to the city bred and reared may seem questionable, but to him who has had the good fortune or ill fortune, if it be so, to have any knowledge concerning qualities of soil, the presence of hardpan, gumbo, or adobe has a distinctive significance such as to demonstrate beyond a peradventure of doubt, and almost to a mathematical certainty, the materiality of such a representation. To the farmer or one familiar with, the presence of hardpan, gumbo, or adobe depreciates greatly, if it does not condemn, the land. The words themselves in connection with farm lands declare a greatly lessened value if they do not destroy value. However, city reared and bred can find that such a representation is material. See Stone v. McCarty, 64 Cal. App. 158, 220 P. 690.

[15-18] Appellants next urge that there is no evidence to in any wise connect Mrs. Anna L. Myers, one of the defendants, appellants herein, with any of said representations. The defendants each chose to rely upon the answer filed in their behalf, and hence cannot now claim there is or should have been a separate answer on behalf of each. However, they claim that the trial court tried the issue herein as though it had been properly traversed. The issue as to the question of value has been so considered by us because the trial court took evidence on the question and apparently so treated it. However, in the allegation here under discussion we find no evidence, whatever, either to sustain or to disprove the allegation of the presence on said premises of hardpan, gumbo, adobe, or stones. Therefore, we must assume that the trial court treated such allegation as an admitted fact, not only as to the defendant Roscoe A. Myers, but also as to the defendant Anna L. Myers. Such admission itself is sufficient to bind her by the judgment. Had a separate answer been filed on her behalf denying that she had made any such representations as alleged, undoubtedly there would have been evidence offered on such an issue, and the trial court would have made an appropriate finding relative thereto, or, in the absence of any evidence to establish such allegation, the trial court would have found in her favor. In the present state of the record she is by admission bound by the judgment. Appellants further urge that there is no evidence to sustain the finding that, had the land been as represented, it would have been worth $80,200. The complaint alleges: "That had all the lands of said defendants hereinbefore described been as represented they would have been worth the sum of $80,200. That in the condition that they were they were not worth to exceed the sum of $6,500; that the plaintiff has been damaged thereby in the sum of $102,000, no part of which has been paid." The answer in traversing such allegation alleges as follows: "Deny that all of the lands of the defendant would have been worth, except in trade, the sum of $80,200 had they been as represented; deny that in the condition they were they were not worth to exceed the sum of $6,500; deny that the plaintiffs had been damaged in the sum of $102,000 or in any sum whatever." Such a denial raises no issue as to the alleged value of the said lands of the defendants if they had been as represented, to wit, the sum of $80,200. Marsters v. Lash, 61 Cal. 622. On a conflict of evidence the court found that the property conveyed and transferred to the plaintiffs was worth the sum of $29,500. By the admission of the pleadings the value would have been $80,200 if the same had been as represented. Therefore, the plaintiffs were damaged in the sum of $50,700, or the difference between the actual value of the property and the value the property would have had, had it been as represented. The record is again silent as to any action of the trial court as to receiving or rejecting any evidence in this particular. Hence all of the intendments being in favor of the judgment, we must assume that the trial court received no evidence on the subject of the allegation and relied upon the admission of the pleadings in arriving at its decision. The defendants failed to point out any different theory upon which the cause was tried.

[19] Where appellants claim the benefit of the rule that, even though the answer is insufficient to constitute a denial of the allegations of the complaint, yet, if the trial court proceeded to try the issue as though the allegations were sufficiently traversed without objection from either parties, on appeal, the allegations will be deemed to have been sufficiently traversed. The appellants must, by the record on appeal, show that the trial court placed such a construction on the pleadings, and that such a construction was not objected to by the parties. In the absence of such a showing in the record, the rule is of no avail, and the trial court will not be presumed to have placed such a construction on the issues raised by the pleadings unless it affirmatively so appears.

Other objections urged by the defendant are without merit in view of the holding of the principal questions here involved. For the foregoing reasons the judgment is affirmed.

SPENCE, J.

Petitioners seek annulment of an award of the Industrial Accident Commission granting compensation to respondent Horner for an injury to his eye while engaged in chopping and cording wood. The only question presented upon review is whether Horner was an employee of petitioner Provensano, or an independent contractor.

In February, 1930, Provensano entered into a written contract with Horner under which Horner agreed to cut and pile on Provensano's ranch not less than two hundred cords of wood at $3.50 per cord. Thereafter Horner, together with his son and two other men, proceeded to the ranch and began operations under the contract. The arrangements with the three other men were made by Horner. The men furnished their own axes and wedges, and Provensano furnished the saws. Shortly after starting to cut and pile the wood under the written contract it was ascertained that there was not enough wood on the ranch to make two hundred cords. Thereupon it was agreed that the contract be canceled, Provensano telling the men "Go ahead and cut wood, I will pay you three dollars and fifty cents a cord." Thereafter Provensano paid each man for the wood cut and piled by him at the agreed rate. Provensano made only a few visits to the ranch during the entire time the men were working, on which visits he merely showed the men the ridges on which to cut and measured the amount of wood cut and piled in order to determine the amount due. The men worked whenever they pleased and engaged in hunting and fishing on several occasions. In the words of the petitioner, "Each man was his own boss." The foregoing are the material facts disclosed by the evidence, and it is conceded that "the testimony does not indicate that any supervision was attempted by Provansano, but he allowed the men to carry the work along on their own time, merely paying them for the quantity cut and piled."

Petitioners rely upon a line of authorities holding wood choppers to be independent contractors and not employees under similar circumstances. Parsons v. Industrial Accident Commission, 178 Cal. 394, 173 P. 585; Fidelity & Deposit Co. v. Brush, 176 Cal. 448, 168 P. 890; Donlon Brothers v. Industrial Accident Commission, 173 Cal. 250, 159 P. 715; Valente v. Industrial Accident Commission, 68 Cal. App. 151, 228 P. 667. Respondent concedes that there is no substantial difference between the facts in the present case and the facts in Parsons v. Industrial Accident Commission, supra, except that Provansano indicated what timber was to be cut, whereas in the case referred to the woodchopper was engaged to cut such timber as in his judgment was best suited for his purpose. We do not believe, however, that the mere indication by the owner of the timber to be cut constituted such control over the details of the work and the means by which it was to be accomplished or implied such reservation of the right of control as to make Horner an employee rather than an independent contractor.

[1-3] Respondents contend that, since the decision in Parsons v. Industrial Accident Commission, supra, "a material modification has been made respecting the criteria for determining whether an engagement is an independent contract or an agreement of employment." It has long been settled that neither section 21 of article 20 of the Constitution in its original form nor the amendment of that section in 1918 altered the accepted meaning of the terms "employee" or "independent contractor," and that any attempt by the Legislature to extend the scope of the Workmen's Compensation Act by new definitions of those terms is unconstitutional. Fidelity & Casualty Co. v. Industrial Accident Commission, 191 Cal. 404, 216 P. 578, 43 A. L. R. 1304; Flickenger v. Industrial Accident Commission, 181 Cal. 425, 184 P. 851, 19 A. L. R. 1150. Respondents, however, cite and rely upon Hillen v. Industrial Accident Commission, 199 Cal. 577, 250 P. 570, where an award of the commission in favor of one doing shingling at so much per thousand was affirmed. We find nothing in that case which modifies the accepted rules for determining whether a person is an employee or an independent contractor. In affirming the award the decision rests largely upon the ground that the employer could at any moment direct the details of the work and did in fact do so on occasions. In other words, there was ample evidence in that case to support the conclusion that the right of control as to the details of the work and the means by which it was accomplished was retained by the employer. This test has always been regarded as the decisive test of the relationship. In Moody v. Industrial Accident Commission, 204 Cal. 668, 269 P. 542, 543, 60 A. L. R. 299, the court said: "The following definition may be regarded as a correct statement of what constitutes an independent contractor: One who renders service in the course of an independent employment or occupation, following his employer's desires only in the results of the work, and not the means whereby it is to be accomplished. * * * The decisive test of the relationship is: Who has the right to direct what shall be done, and when and how it shall be done? Who has the right to general control?"

[4] There is nothing in the present case to distinguish it from the ordinary engagement of a woodchopper, chopping and cording wood at so much per cord. Ordinarily the owner of the land is interested only in the result of the work and is not concerned with the means or details by which that result is accomplished. In such cases where the work is done under an agreement to pay for the result of the work at a certain amount per cord, and there is no express understanding with respect to the right of control by the owner over the details of the work or the means by which it is accomplished, and no such understanding may be implied from the conduct of the parties, the relationship established is that of independent contractor and not that of employer and employee. Provansano was originally interested in having two hundred cords of wood chopped and corded. He entered into the written contract with Horner to accomplish that result. Under the original contract Horner was admittedly an independent contractor. The contract was canceled solely because of the shortage of timber on the ranch, and thereafter the men continued to cut such timber as was there under substantially the same arrangement as previously existed under the written contract. The time and manner of doing the work was at all times left entirely to the men themselves without any supervision or direction by Provansano. There was nothing in the original contract with Horner nor the subsequent understanding with the four men nor in the conduct of the parties from which a reasonable inference might be drawn that any right of control was reserved by Provansano over the details of the work or the means to be adopted in accomplishing the result. Under these circumstances Horner was an independent contractor and not an employee, and the commission had no jurisdiction to make the award.

The award is annulled.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Daniel Beecher, Judge.

Action by M. Lucile Platt against Harry O. Platt and another. From an adverse judgment, plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

H. C. Hopkins, of San Diego, and H. B.
Daniel, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Miller & Ellis, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

Mr. Presiding Justice FINCH delivered the opinion of the court.

The plaintiff brought this action for the cancellation of a deed which she had executed to the defendant Harry O. Platt, who will be referred to herein as the defendant and respondent, and also demanded judgment compelling him to reconvey the property described in the deed.

In his original answer the defendant alleged that in September, 1918, Martha E.
Platt, the mother of the parties, conveyed the property in suit to the plaintiff with the understanding and agreement that, if the defendant, who was then in the Navy of the United States, "died in the service * * * the plaintiff should have this property, but, that if this defendant lived, that the plaintiff would hold an undivided one-half interest in said property in trust for this answering defendant, and would convey the said interest to this answering defendant at such a time as he might desire to have his said share conveyed to him; * * * that thereafter and on or about November, 1919, the said Martha
E. Platt died, and on or about December, 1919, the plaintiff placed the said deed of record; * * * that on or about March 27, 1925, this answering defendant was engaged in the business of brick contractor, and on or about such date he was offered certain contracts provided he could give a surety bond to guarantee the faithful performance of his contract; that in order to procure such surety bond it was necessary for this answering defendant to make a showing to the bonding company writing said bond that he was financially responsible; that * * * under such circumstances the plaintiff and this answering defendant agreed that she would deliver to him the deed referred to in

* * * the plaintiff's complaint for the purpose of his putting the same of record; and it was further understood and agreed that such deed as to an undivided one-half interest was to convey to this answering defendant the undivided one-half interest in said property theretofore held in trust for him by the plaintiff; * * * that thereafter, in accordance with said agreement, he executed and placed of record a deed to the plaintiff reconveying to her an undivided one-half interest in the said property."

The case has been tried twice. It appears from the appellant's opening brief that on the first trial judgment was entered in favor of the plaintiff quieting her title to the land in controversy. The defendant made a motion for a new trial, which was granted by the trial court. Thereafter the defendant filed an amended answer in which, in addition to the foregoing averments of the original answer, and as a separate defense, he alleged that the deed from Martha E. Platt to the plaintiff was never delivered.

The court found that Martha E. Platt signed a deed purporting to convey the property to the plaintiff; "that prior to the making of said deed it was understood and agreed between plaintiff and Martha E. Platt that if Martha E. Platt would make a deed to said property to plaintiff to convey title to plaintiff on the death of Martha E. Platt, that after the death of Martha E. Platt plaintiff would convey to defendant Harry O. Platt a one-half interest in said property upon his request, if he returned from the United States Navy and survived his mother Martha E.
Platt"; but that said deed was never delivered by Martha E. Platt to the plaintiff.
Judgment was entered "that plaintiff M.
Lucile Platt and Harry O. Platt and their brother Howard R. Platt is each the owner of an undivided one-third interest in fee simple in the * * * property, * * * as tenants in common as heirs of their mother, Martha E. Platt, deceased, subject to administration upon the estate of said Martha E. Platt." The plaintiff has appealed from the judgment. The only question presented on this appeal is whether there is sufficient evidence to support the finding that the deed from Martha E. Platt to the plaintiff was never delivered.

In appellant's brief it is said: "We have never quoted one word of appellant's testimony or called the slightest attention to it. Our purpose is to forcefully demonstrate that we have made out a perfect case without a word from appellant's lips."

It may be conceded that the testimony other than that of the plaintiff makes out a good case in her behalf, but, unfortunately for her, at the first trial when no issue had been raised as to the delivery of the deed from the mother to the plaintiff, the latter gave testimony upon which the court, to a large extent, apparently based its finding at the second trial that the deed was not delivered.

In appellant's opening brief it is said: "The plaintiff was single and had been a school teacher for several years. During the year 1918, being the year the mother executed to plaintiff the deed hereinafter referred to, the plaintiff was a clerk in the War Department in Washington, and the defendant was married and in the Navy; * * * the only property owned by the mother was that transferred to plaintiff by this deed. It was the home in Los Angeles where the family resided since about 1908, and a vacant tract at Culver City owned since about 1906. In September, 1918, the mother executed a grant deed to all of said property in favor of the plaintiff; * * * it recited a consideration of love and affection and $10. Four days after the mother's death, more than one year later, the deed was placed on record by the plaintiff."

At the second trial the plaintiff testified: "I first saw that deed in the bank box that I held in the Security Trust and Savings Bank some time in May, I believe it was, after I came back from Washington, D. C."; that prior to her mother's death she took the deed and other papers out of the safe deposit box; that "the deed, together with all the other papers were given to my mother, and she, in turn, some few days after I had brought them home. * * * handed me the deed and told me that it was the deed to the property and that I had better take it up and have a certain friend of mine, who was there at the time, have it recorded for me. This particular friend worked down in the Hall of Records, and that is why my mother mentioned having her take it down and have it recorded for me, because I had given up the bank box; * * * she had handed me two or three other papers, too, in the meantime * * * and mother handed me the deed and she says, 'Lucile, now, there is a deed to the property. Let Marie take it down and have it recorded for you, so we won't have to worry about any bank to charge, as we haven't a bank box.'"

"Q. Did you hand the deed to Marie at that time? A. No, I didn't.

"Q. What did you do with the deed? A. I held the deed and then after I had gone over the papers, went upstairs with the papers and put it away in the cedar chest with the other papers.

"Q. And did you give it to Marie to have it recorded? A. No, I didn't give it to Marie.

"Q. Where did you keep the deed during that time? A. In my cedar chest in my room, together with all the other papers.

"Q. How long was that? A. * * * It must have been June. I kept it there until, I believe it was, some time in December that I had it recorded.

"Q. Was that after your mother's death? A. After my mother died, yes."

Marie testified that on the occasion referred to the mother handed the deed to the plaintiff and told her to have Marie place it on record. There is other testimony consisting largely of statements made by the mother tending to support the respective theories of the parties.

At the first trial the plaintiff testified: "I left here in September * * * 1918 * * * it was the first part of the month, just before school started * * * my mother told me (at that time) that she intended to make out a grant deed of the place to me, for me to keep and to hold so that I would always have a home. * * *

"Q. Well, while you were away did you receive that deed? A. My mother told me (in a letter) that she had put the deed in the box. * * * I did not keep the letter * * * it was shortly after September 20th; I do not remember just the date * * * she told me that she had a deed made out, made out in my name * * * and that she had put it in our box at the Security Trust and Savings Bank, so that it would be perfectly safe; that I was to have it recorded when I needed it, when she was no longer here * * * my mother wrote the letter, as near as I can remember it, shortly after the 20th of September, when she made the deed out. * * *

"Q. Did you have a conversation with your mother on this subject-matter, that is, about the deed after you came back? A. I did * * * it occurred at home * * * my mother told me she had made the deed and she wanted me to go up to the bank and see it and see that it was all right.

"Q. Anything else stated at the time on the subject? A. That was all.

"Q. Did you have any other conversation with your mother on that subject after that? A. No, sir. I saw the deed, I came back and I told her I had seen it, yes; * * * she said that she wanted to have things left for me, she was glad to have the home left for me; that was her idea, to leave a home for me.

"Q. Did you have any other conversation or conversations with your mother on that subject-matter prior to her death? A. No, sir, no, that was satisfactory.

"Q. What did you do with it, if anything? A. I left it in the box just as my mother wished me to do.

"Q. And what did you finally do with it, if anything? A. After mother died I recorded it. * * *

"Q. Now, calling your attention to the time when your mother executed this deed, I believe you stated this morning that you and your mother had a safety deposit box at the Security Bank? A. We did. * * *

"Q. And you both had keys to that box, didn't you? A. We did.

"Q. And who put the deed in the box? A. My mother did.

"Q. Your mother put it in the box? A. She did.

"Q. Did you have a key to the box? A. Yes.

"Q. You had a key and your mother had a key. A. I had a key and my mother had a key.

"Q. And the box was a joint box which could be— A. Yes, it was.

"Q. Both parties had keys to it? A. Yes.

"Q. And it remained in that situation up to the time of your mother's death, did it? A. It did.

"Q. And after she died, did you find her key to the box? A. I do not remember what I did. I must have, though, because I changed the box afterwards. When I came back I took another box the next year when I came back. * * *

"Q. How long after your mother's death, did you go down and get the deed? A. I do not remember but it was some time in December.

"Q. Of 1919? A. Yes.

"Q. When did your mother die? A. The 18th of December.

"The Court: Did you get it the same day that you recorded it, if you recall? A. I do not recall, I probably did."

[1, 2] It was in the discretion of the trial court to believe that the plaintiff's testimony given at the first trial is true, notwithstanding there is corroboration of her contradictory testimony given at the second trial. It cannot be held as a matter of law that the plaintiff's testimony at the first trial is insufficient to support the finding that the deed was never delivered. According to that testimony, it remained until after her mother's death in the joint safe deposit box of the mother and the plaintiff. Such evidence does not necessarily show that the mother ever surrendered her right to retake possession of the instrument.

"While delivery may be by words and acts, or both combined, and manual transmission of the deed from the grantor to the grantee is not required, it is an indispensable feature of every delivery of a deed, whether absolute or conditional, that there be a parting with the possession of it, and with all power and control over it, by the grantor, for the benefit of the grantee at the time of the delivery. The dominion over the instrument must pass from the grantor with the intent that it shall pass to the grantee, if the latter will accept it. And where the proof fails to show that the grantor did any act by which he parted with the possession of the deed for the benefit of the grantee, the question of intent becomes immaterial. In other words, delivery may be effected by any act or word manifesting an unequivocal intention to surrender the instrument so as to deprive the grantor of all authority over it or of the right of recalling it; but if it does not evidence an intention to part presently and unconditionally with the deed, there is no delivery. * * * While the rule that the grantor must part with all dominion and control over his deed does not mean that he must put it out of his physical power to procure repossession of it, nevertheless, if the deed remains within the grantor's control and is liable to be recalled, there is, according to almost unanimous authority, no delivery, notwithstanding that he has parted with its immediate possession. He must retain no right to reclaim or recall it." 8 R. C. L. 985. See, also, Devlin on Deeds (3d Ed.) 375; Stone v. Daily, 181 Cal. 571, 185 P. 665; Donahue v. PEOPLE v. ALBRITTON et al.
Cr. 1984.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 1, California.

Dec. 4, 1930.

Rehearing Denied Dec. 16, 1930. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 29, 1930.

1. Homicide $\Rightarrow$ 234(3).

Evidence corroborating testimony of accomplices held to sustain conviction for murder committed by accomplice in unsuccessful attempt to rob (Pen. Code, § 1111).

2. Criminal law $\Rightarrow$ 511(1).

Conviction may not be had where attempted corroboration of accomplice testimony rests on evidence merely creating suspicion of defendant's guilt (Pen. Code, § 1111).

3. Criminal law $\Rightarrow$ 511(2).

Evidence corroborating accomplice testimony, to authorize conviction, need not be absolutely convincing or complete, but is sufficient if it tends to connect accused with commission of offense (Pen. Code, § 1111).

4. Homicide $\Rightarrow$ 29.

Defendant was guilty of murder actually committed by codefendant while attempting to escape after abandoning attempt to rob.

It was no defense to accused, who acted as lookout for two codefendants, who actually attempted to commit robbery, that before murder was committed, conspiracy previously existing was abandoned, in that one of defendants on entering premises intended to be robbed almost immediately retreated therefrom and delivered his pistol to accused, and that thereafter, when second codefendant likewise had abandoned his intention to commit robbery and was endeavoring to escape he did later shoot deceased.

5. Witnesses $\Rightarrow$ 52(7).

Testimony of wife having no tendency to convict or acquit husband pleading guilty to murder charge held competent against codefendant, since wife was not witness "against" husband (Pen. Code, § 1322).

Pen. Code, § 1322, provides that neither spouse is competent witness for or against other in criminal action to which one or both are parties, except with consent of both.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Against," see Words and Phrases.]

6. Criminal law $\Rightarrow$ 386.

Accused's identity as person making admissions to witness over telephone having been established by another witness, testimony respecting such admissions held competent against objection of insufficient foundation.

It appeared that accused first talked over telephone with mother-in-law of witness who testified as to conversation with accused; that witness' mother-in-law identified voice on telephone as that of accused; that accused expressed wish to talk to witness who immediately was called to the phone; that in subsequent conversation between accused and witness' mother-in-law, accused admitted having had previous conversation with witness.

7. Criminal law $\Rightarrow$ 622(1).

Refusal of separate trial to defendant in murder case held not abuse of discretion (Pen. Code, § 1098).

There was no abuse of discretion because, after each of accused's codefendants pleaded guilty as charged in information, they were eliminated from trial and thereafter defendant did have separate trial as to charge against him.

8. Criminal law $\Rightarrow$ 1202(3).

Admitting evidence of prior conviction of violating Harrison Narcotic Act as basis for sentence as prior felony offender held not error (Pen. Code, § 668; Harrison Narcotic Act).

9. Criminal law $\Rightarrow$ 1202(3).

Admitting evidence of prior conviction of violating federal customs statute as basis of increasing punishment held error (Pen. Code, § 668; Jones-Miller Act).

The admission of such evidence was error because Jones-Miller Act (42 Stat.
596, as amended) relates solely to customs laws, and California has no such laws. Pen. Code, § 668, provides that person who has been convicted in any other state, government, or county of offense which, if committed within this state, would be punishable by laws of state by imprisonment in state prison, is punishable for any subsequent crime committed within state as prescribed to same extent as if prior conviction had taken place in state court.

10. Criminal law $\Rightarrow$ 1186(4).

In murder prosecution, error in admitting evidence of accused's prior conviction of federal customs laws for increasing punishment held not to require reversal (Pen. Code, § 668; Const. art. 6, § 4½; Jones-Miller Act).

The admission of such evidence was not prejudicial because evidence, though not amounting to demonstration of accused's guilt, was amply sufficient to authorize conviction, and in view of fact that evidence of accused's violation of Harrison Narcotic Act was legally before jury.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Carlos S. Hardy, Judge.

Theodore Franklin Albritton and another were convicted of murder and Frank M. Shiraishi was convicted of murder as prior offender, and latter alone appeals.

Affirmed.

Charles J. Orbison, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

HOUSER, J.

By an information filed in the superior court, three men named respectively Albritton, Smith and Shiraishi were charged with the commission by them of the crime of murder. In the same information the defendant Shiraishi was also charged with the commission of a prior felony. Shortly following the date of the arraignment of the three defendants Shiraishi presented a motion that he be granted a trial separate from either or both of his codefendants—which motion was by the court denied. Two days after the trial of all the defendants had commenced, Albritton and Smith each withdrew his former plea of "not guilty" and in lieu thereof entered a plea of "guilty as charged in the information." The trial then proceeded as against Shiraishi only, and following his conviction of the crime of murder and the finding of the jury that therefore he had "suffered a prior conviction of a felony," he has appealed to this court from the judgment and the order entered by the superior court by which his motion for a new trial was denied.

From the evidence received on the trial of the action it would appear that the murder in question occurred following an unsuccessful attempt made by the three defendants to rob an alleged Chinese gambling establishment. Each of the defendants Albritton and Smith testified fully regarding the plan of the robbery and the preliminary arrangements which he stated had been made by the three defendants in anticipation of its commission; and which included the purchase of a police badge by Shiraishi for the use of Smith in order that he and Albritton, who also had a police badge, might pretend to be police officers at and during the time that the robbery was taking place. It also appeared that Albritton and Smith had gone to the scene of the attempted robbery and resulting murder in an automobile owned by Smith; while Shiraishi repaired thither in a Ford coupé. The testimony given by Albritton and Smith also shows that they were expected to enter the room or rooms where several Chinese were engaged in gambling and thereupon commit the robbery—during which time Shiraishi was to remain outside and act as a "lookout." The plan of operation was but partially completed. Almost immediately after Albritton and Smith had obtained an entrance into the place where the proposed victims of the robbery were congregated, Smith apparently abandoned his former intention to commit any crime; at least he left the room by the same door at which he had entered it, at which point (according to his testimony) he encountered Shiraishi to whom he gave the police badge and a pistol which he (Smith) theretofore had had in his possession, and thereupon left the scene of the crime. Seeing that Smith was leaving the premises, Albritton also decided to make his "getaway" by a rear door; and it was while making his escape from the premises and in the course of a pistol fight between Albritton and some of the Chinese that Albritton fired the shot from his revolver which caused the death of the person for whose murder the defendant Shiraishi was on trial.

Section 1111 of the Penal Code provides that: "A conviction cannot be had upon the testimony of an accomplice unless it be corroborated by such other evidence as shall tend to connect the defendant with the commission of the offense. * * *"

In that regard, among other incriminatory facts which were introduced in evidence was testimony that shortly preceding the time when the crime occurred Shiraishi was seen in the immediate neighborhood of the alleged gambling establishment where the attempted robbery and subsequent murder took place; that Albritton and Shiraishi were seen together in a Ford coupé in the afternoon of the same day; that on that day Shiraishi had purchased a police badge similar in appearance to the one used by Albritton at the time the crime was committed; that on the day in question Shiraishi had borrowed from a friend of his a Ford coupé; that one or two hours after the murder had taken place Shiraishi telephoned to the wife of Albritton and told her that Albritton had been shot, and in effect that the murdered man had been shot by a Japanese or a Chinaman and said that he (Shiraishi) "was there"; that following the arrest of Shiraishi, in the upholstering of the automobile in which he had been transported from the place of his arrest to the jail, the arresting officer found a police badge which resembled the police badge which Shiraishi had purchased on the day when the crime was committed.

No useful purpose would be served by an exhaustive review of legal principles contained in the many authorities of this state which both define the word "corroboration" and relate to the sufficiency of evidence introduced for the purpose of corroborating testimony given by an accomplice. It may be conceded that the law does not contemplate the conviction of a person accused of the commission of a crime where the attempted corroboration of the testimony given by an accomplice rests upon such evidence as should merely create a suspicion of the guilt of the defendant on trial. On the other hand, in order that it meet the requirements of the statute, it is not imperative that the corroborating evidence be absolutely convincing, or that it be complete as to each item of evidence to which the accomplice has testified. It may be but slight and, if standing alone, entitled to but little weight; provided always that it "tend to connect the defendant with the commission of the offense." People v. Kelly, 69 Cal. App. 558, 570, 231 P. 767, 772, and authorities there cited.

From a consideration of the evidence adduced on the trial of the instant action in corroboration of the testimony given by the accomplices of defendant Shiraishi, it would seem manifest that it was ample not only for the purpose of satisfying the demands of section 1111 of the Penal Code, but as well to justify the jury in its apparent conclusion that the crime in question was committed with the intentional criminal consent, co-operation, and participation of the defendant Shiraishi therein. However, in the same connection, appellant presents the point "that even if there was a conspiracy or common design to commit robbery, the same was abandoned before any homicide was committed."

[4] As hereinbefore indicated, the evidence upon which appellant relies for his conclusion that before the murder was committed the conspiracy which theretofore had existed among the three defendants had been abandoned, was to the effect that almost immediately following the entrance of Albritton and Smith into the alleged gambling house Smith retreated therefrom, delivered his pistol and police badge to Shiraishi, who accepted the same, and that it was only thereafter, while Albritton likewise had abandoned his intention to commit a robbery and was endeavoring to effect his escape from the premises, that the fatal shot was fired.

That the principle for which appellant contends is untenable is decided in each of the cases of People v. Woods, 147 Cal. 265, 81 P. 652, 109 Am. St. Rep. 151, and People v. Kauffman, 152 Cal. 331, 92 P. 861, where a situation was involved similar to that presented in the instant case. See, also, People v. Boss (Cal. Sup.) 290 P. 881; People v. Dowell, 204 Cal. 109, 266 P. 807; and, generally, authorities cited in 13 Cal. Jur. 600.

[5] It is urged by appellant that the trial court committed prejudicial error in that, over the objection of defendant Shiraishi, the wife of defendant Albritton was permitted to testify to certain material facts within her knowledge.

In part, section 1322 of the Penal Code provides that: "Neither husband nor wife is a competent witness for or against the other in a criminal action or proceeding to which one or both are parties, except with the consent of both. * * *"

The record herein shows that the wife voluntarily and willingly testified as a witness in the case, and that her husband expressly consented that she do so. But even had the husband objected, it is difficult to perceive how the testimony given by the wife would have been affected by the terms of the statute. In substance, the provision of section 1322 is that the wife is not a competent witness "against" the husband. Manifestly, the primary purpose of the statute is not to afford protection to third persons, but only to preserve inviolate the confidence which by legal sanction exists between a husband and a wife. Before the time at which the wife gave her testimony the husband had pleaded "guilty as charged in the information." He was no longer a defendant on trial. As far as having a tendency either to convict or to acquit her husband of the charge preferred against him, the testimony of the wife was of no effect. In the language of the statute, the wife was not a witness "against" the husband. In section 392, volume 1, Wharton's Criminal Evidence, appears the statement: "* * * Where, also, a married defendant has pleaded guilty, or is entirely removed from the record, whether by verdict pronounced in his favor or by a previous conviction, his wife may testify either for or against any other persons who may be parties to the record, and the mere hope that, by testifying against a prisoner, a wife may procure the pardon of her husband who has been previously convicted of another crime will not affect her competency, though it may shake her credit. * * *"

To the effect that where it appears that the testimony of the wife will not injure the husband she may be a competent witness against an accomplice, see section 306, Underhill on Evidence; also the following authorities: United States v. Addatte, 6 Blatchf. 76, Fed. Cas. No. 14,422; Powell v. State, 58 Ala. 362; Commonwealth v. Manson, 2 Ashm. (Pa.) 31; Moffit v. State, 2 Humph. (Tenn.) 99, 36 Am. Dec. 301; Blackburn v. Commonwealth, 12 Bush (Ky.) 181.

In the instant case the testimony given by the wife occupied the same position as though the husband was not a party either to the particular action or to any other action arising out of the same alleged facts. Although in certain circumstances (not here present) it is possible that persons other than the husband might claim the benefit of the rule which forbids the wife to testify against the husband (as to which situation no opinion is intended to be expressed herein), an examination of the statute fails to disclose language which will bear the construction that, in the circumstances here present, the appellant was entitled to have the testimony given by the wife excluded from consideration by the jury.

[6] A part of the testimony given by the wife of defendant Albritton consisted of certain admissions made to her by defendant Shiraishi in a conversation which took place over the telephone—to which testimony defendant Shiraishi objected on the ground that a sufficient foundation had not been laid for its introduction in evidence. It appeared that Shiraishi had first talked with the mother of Albritton; that the mother identified the voice at the telephone as that of Shiraishi; and that he expressed a wish to talk to the wife, who immediately was called to the telephone. Furthermore, that in a subsequent conversation between Shiraishi and the mother, he admitted having had the previous conversation with the wife. The identity of defendant Shiraishi having been thus established, it follows that his objection to the introduction in evidence of the testimony in question was not well taken.

That part of the information herein which related to the charge that before the filing of such information defendant had been convicted of a felony, is as follows: "That before the commission of the offense hereinabove set forth in this information, said defendant, Frank M. Shiraishi, was, in the United States District Court, Southern Division, Southern District of California, convicted of the crime of violation of Harrison Narcotic Act of December 17, 1914, as amended February 24, 1919, and Jones-Miller Act of February 9, 1909, as amended January 17, 1914, and as amended May 26, 1922, a felony. * * *

In the case of People v. Bigelow, 94 Cal. App. 28, 270 P. 460, it was held that a conviction under the "Harrison Narcotic Act" constituted a felony which, on being pleaded and proved, authorized the trial court to impose a sentence as for one who "theretofore had been convicted of a felony." Therefore, as far as concerned the introduction of evidence which tended to prove the prior conviction of defendant Shiraishi of a violation of the so-called "Harrison Narcotic Act" (38 Stat. 785, as amended), no error was committed by the trial court.

[9, 10] But as relates to the conviction of defendant Shiraishi of a violation of the "Jones-Miller Act" (42 Stat. 596, as amended) a different situation is presented.

By the provisions of section 668 of the Penal Code: "Every person who has been convicted in any other state, government, or country, of an offense which, if committed within this state, would be punishable by the laws of this state by imprisonment in the state prison, is punishable for any subsequent crime committed within this state in the manner prescribed in sections 644, 666 and 667, and to the same extent as if such prior conviction had taken place in a court of this state."

The objections of defendant on the trial of the action, as well as on this appeal, are directed solely to the fact that the "Jones-Miller Act" relates to custom laws and that "we have no custom laws whatsoever in California." In substance, the point urged by appellant is that because there are no custom laws in this state no authority existed for either pleading or proving the prior conviction of defendant of a violation of the custom laws of the United States, and that the record of such conviction was introduced in evidence "for the purpose of degrading and debasing defendant in the eyes of the jury."

Since no authority is cited by respondent by which may be justified in law the introduction in evidence of a judgment of conviction of a defendant for an offense not denounced by the statutes of this state, and since it is manifest that the natural effect of the introduction in evidence of such a record necessarily would be to create a prejudice in the "mind" of the jury against the defendant, it would follow that the point presented by appellant is well taken. However, the mere fact that error was committed by the lower court in the course of the trial is not all that is required. Before a judgment may be set aside, or a new trial may be granted, it is necessary that "after an examination of the entire cause, including the evidence, the court shall be of the opinion that the error complained of has resulted in a miscarriage of justice." Section 41½, art. 6, Const.

Considering the evidence adduced on the trial of the action, this court is impressed with the correctness and justice of the verdict returned by the jury. Although the evidence did not amount to a demonstration of the guilt of the defendant Shiraishi, it would be difficult to understand how any verdict other than that the defendant was "guilty as charged in the information" could have been rightly returned. Nor, when the fact that the prior conviction of the defendant on a charge of having violated the "Harrison Narcotic Act" was legally before the jury is kept in mind, is it possible to more than conjecture that another and different conviction of the defendant for a violation of the custom laws of the United States would produce any effect on the jury as far as influencing it in any way in the rendition of its verdict was concerned. By the judgment of conviction on the "Harrison Narcotic Act" count, he was already so "degraded and debased" that a similar judgment under another count in the same action (even though for a different offense) could not have resulted in such prejudice to the defendant as to make the error present a situation where this court should be convinced that it "resulted in a miscarriage of justice."

The judgment and the order denying the motion for a new trial are affirmed.

MEYERS v. LASKER et al.

Civ. 4220.

District Court of Appeal, Third District,
California.

Dec. 18, 1930.

1. Corporations ⇨123(17).

Maker's complaint against payee and others held to state cause of action for conversion of stock pledged as collateral security for note, notwithstanding maker's willingness to allow credit for amount of note.

Complaint in question showed that stock was converted before note was due, and that no demand for payment was made or notice given to maker.

2. Corporations ⇨123(17).

Before bringing trover for conversion of stock pledged as collateral security for note, maker was not required to tender payment of note.

Maker was not seeking to recover possession of pledged stock, as in replevin, but was suing for damages for wrongful appropriation by pledgees. It was alleged further, on information and belief, that part of proceeds from sale of stock was applied to payment of note, and that note had been returned to maker fully satisfied.

3. Pledges ⇨11.

That pledgor deposited pledge with pledgee holding jointly with others did not invalidate pledge (Civ. Code, §§ 2993, 2995).

Civ. Code, § 2993, contemplates that, by consent of parties, pledge may be placed in custody of third person to hold as trustee who, in view of section 2995, is termed a pledge holder, and is bound to enforce pledge.

4. Pledges ⇨26.

Third persons in whose custody pledge is deposited jointly, being joint pledge holders, are bound to enforce terms of pledge (Civ. Code §§ 2993, 2995).

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Leon R. Yankwich, Judge.

Action by Laura M. Meyers against A. I. Lasker and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals.

Reversed, with directions.

Charles A. Sunderlin, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Newman, Haas & Schwartz and Fredericks, Hanna & Morton, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

Mr. Justice R. L. THOMPSON delivered the opinion of the Court.

This is a suit for conversion of corporation stock. A demurrer to the second amended complaint was sustained without leave to amend. A judgment was thereupon entered, from which the plaintiff has appealed.

The second amended complaint alleges that the Lasker Finance Corporation took over the business and assets of the A. I. Lasker Company, a corporation, in October, 1925; that the plaintiff was the owner and holder of 316 shares of the capital stock of the A. I. Lasker Company, of the reasonable market value of $37,500; that, on November 1, 1925, for a valuable consideration, the plaintiff executed and delivered to the defendant Rust & Co. his promissory note for the sum of $19,640, payable one year from the date thereof, with interest at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum, payable at maturity; "that on or about the date aforesaid, the plaintiff delivered to the defendants Rust & Co., Nat Cordish, * * * and the Mutual Motors Incorporated of Delaware, * * * with her endorsement, stock certificates for the aforesaid described stock, as collateral security and as a pledge for the payment of plaintiff's promissory note, * * * on the agreement * * * [with said defendants] that the said stock would be held by the aforesaid defendants as collateral and a pledge for the payment of the said promissory note, and as a part thereof, and not otherwise, and that the said stock would not be sold or otherwise disposed of, and would return the said stock to the plaintiff in the event that plaintiff's said promissory note was paid or released. That thereupon and immediately thereafter, and before the said promissory note of the plaintiff was due or payable, and without any demand for payment, and without the knowledge or consent of the plaintiff, the said defendants * * * converted the said stock and the whole thereof; that the said defendants * * * did thereupon and immediately thereafter sell and deliver the said stock to the defendants A. I. Lasker and the Lasker Finance Corporation with full knowledge and notice by the said defendants A. I. Lasker and the Lasker Finance Corporation of the interest of the plaintiff in and to and ownership of the said stock. * * * That the defendants A. I. Lasker and Lasker Finance Corporation were not, and never have been the holders or owners of plaintiff's said promissory note. * * * That the said stock, at the time it was converted by the said defendants, to-wit, on or about the 18th day of December, 1925, was of the reasonable and market value of thirty-seven thousand five hundred ($37,500.00) dollars." Whereupon the plaintiff prays judgment for $17,860, the alleged difference between the value of the stock and the amount due upon her promissory note.

[1] The second amended complaint states a perfectly good cause of action for conversion of the stock. The plaintiff might well have omitted all reference to her assumption that the stock was prematurely sold and applied to the payment of her note and that the holder of the note was entitled to credit for the amount of that instrument. The allegations specifically show that the note was not due at the time of the conversion. In spite of plaintiff's willingness to credit the holder of the note with the amount represented thereby, the complaint, nevertheless, states a good cause of action for conversion.

[2] The respondents confuse this action of trover with one of replevin when they defend the judgment by declaring that the pledgor is bound to make proper tender of payment of the note before she may demand a return of the pledge. This is not a suit to recover the possession of the pledge. It is a suit for damages for the wrongful appropriation of the pledge by the pledgees thereof. The debt was not due when the stock was appropriated. It was alleged, however, on information and belief, that a portion of the proceeds from the sale of the stock was applied to the payment of the note in full, and that the note had been returned to the plaintiff fully satisfied. Certainly a tender of the amount of a note which had been fully paid and discharged would not be a condition precedent to the maintenance of a suit in trover.

There is no merit in the respondents' assertion that the complaint does not allege the acts constituting the conversion, or that the stock was sold prior to the maturity of the note. The complaint specifically alleges the wrongful sale of the stock by the pledgees before the maturity of the note. This was a violation of the terms of the pledge, and constituted a conversion of the stock.

[3,4] Nor is there a defect as to the validity of the pledge merely because the stock was deposited with the payee of the note jointly with other individuals to hold as security for the payment of the debt. Indeed, by consent of the debtor and creditor, the pledge may be placed in the custody of a third person to hold as a trustee to secure the payment of the debt. Section 2993, Civ. Code. Under such circumstances, this trustee is termed a pledge holder, and is in duty bound to enforce the terms of the pledge. Section 2995, Civ. Code; 21 Cal. Jur. 307, sec. 17; Perry v. Parrott, 135 Cal. 238, 67 P. 144. On principle, the same obligation rests upon joint pledge holders to see that the pledge is fulfilled. The demurrer does not raise the question as to an uncertainty of the relationship of the joint pledge holders.

We are of the opinion the second amended complaint states a cause of action for conversion and that the court erred in sustaining the demurrer.

The judgment is reversed. The court is directed to overrule the demurrer and permit the defendants to answer.

McCOMB v. ATCHISON, T. & S. F. RY. CO.
Civ. 7222.

District Court of Appeal, First District,
Division 1, California.

Dec. 9, 1930.

Rehearing Denied Jan. 8, 1931. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 5, 1931.

1. Master and servant ⇨278(18).

Evidence held to sustain finding of railroad's negligence in switching freight cars against cars between which switchman was working.

2. Appeal and error ⇨1002.

Findings of jury on conflicting evidence cannot be disturbed.

3. Master and servant ⇨278(18).

Switchman's testimony as to practice to give warning to employees in respect to switching movements was sufficient of itself to support finding to that effect.

4. Customs and usages ☞19(3).

Testimony of one witness, if believed by jury, is sufficient to prove custom or usage.

5. Master and servant ☞137(6).

Failure to give warning to switchman before switching freight cars against cars between which switchman was working constituted negligence.

Although there was nothing unusually hazardous or unsafe in connection with the work being done, it was shown that switchman was instructed when employment commenced that, under conditions such as those under which he was then working, he would receive warnings of movements of cars unless a tab or lineup was furnished, and also that warnings were usual under such circumstances.

6. Evidence ☞481(3), 490.

Injured switchman's testimony as to force with which cars were struck and distance moved by impact of other cars was competent.

Although it was admitted that switchman was severely injured and suffering great pain, so that consequently he would not be in condition to make accurate observations, nevertheless such facts went to the weight and not to competency of testimony, and question of credit to be given thereto was for jury.

7. Master and servant ☞288(3).

Whether railroad switchman assumed risk of danger in going between cars to couple air hose held for jury.

8. Master and servant ☞231(1).

Employee, in position of danger, has right to presume that master will exercise ordinary care to prevent anything being done which will increase danger incident to employment.

9. Master and servant ☞243(4).

Switchman's failure to observe rules of railroad, observance of which was impractical, was no defense to action for injuries.

In addition to testimony to effect that observance of rule of railroad requiring employees on or about cars or trains in yard to place thereon a blue light at night as a warning was impractical, there was other testimony that no such lights were provided or used in yards and that requirement had never been enforced or observed.

10. Master and servant ☞240(6).

Complaint of railroad switchman of existing conditions was unnecessary in order to avail himself of promise to warn him of danger where there had been theretofore no occasion for complaint.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Edmund P. Morgan, Judge.

Action by Frank P. McComb against the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

Robert Brennan, M. W. Reed, E. T. Lucey, Leo E. Sievert, and H. K. Lockwood, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

John J. McMahon, of Los Angeles, and James F. Brennan and P. J. Murphy, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

The respondent, Frank P. McComb, was a switchman in the employ of appellant, the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Railway Company, a corporation. In the course of switching operations at the Richmond yards of the company near San Francisco, and while freight cars were being switched by the engine crew of which respondent was a member, he went between the cars to couple the air hose. While so doing six other freight cars were switched against the cars between which respondent was working, causing them to move. As the result the trucks of one of the cars ran over respondent's left leg, necessitating its amputation.

Respondent alleged that his injuries were caused by appellant's negligence. The latter denied negligence and pleaded as defenses respondent's contributory negligence and assumption of risk.

A jury having returned a verdict in favor of respondent, appellant moved for a new trial, which was denied, and it has appealed from the judgment.

Appellant contends that the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict, and that the trial court erred in denying its motions for a nonsuit, a directed verdict, and a new trial.

[1] Respondent was injured at about 10:45 p. m. on May 4, 1927. He was working under the orders of a foreman, who also directed the movements of the locomotive which was shunting the cars. Respondent testified that on this occasion he was ordered to couple the air hose on a designated number of cars, and that while making such couplings it was impossible to observe the switching movements in the railroad yard. He also testified in substance that the foreman had previously told him that when performing this character of work he would receive what railway employees call a tab or lineup, which indicates the tracks upon which cars are to be placed and the order in which they are to be moved; and that otherwise he would be warned before the cars were moved. He further testified that it was the practice to give warning under such circumstances unless a tab or lineup was furnished; that he received none, and, following his instructions, proceeded to make the couplings, when without warning the six cars mentioned were shunted against those between which he was working, with force sufficient to move them for a considerable distance; that the impact threw him upon the rails and that his injuries followed. The foreman denied that he agreed to furnish a tab or lineup, or that he agreed to warn respondent. He, with other employees of appellant, also testified that it was not customary to furnish a lineup or give warnings, and, further, that the cars were not shunted violently as claimed by respondent.

[2] The testimony as to the conditions in the railroad yard and what was said and done previous to the accident was voluminous, and a review thereof will serve no useful purpose. It will be sufficient to say that the evidence, though conflicting, was amply sufficient to support plaintiff's version of the affair. The jury believed, and were justified in believing, his testimony, and their findings thereon cannot be disturbed.

[3, 4] Nor can the contention be sustained that the plaintiff's testimony that it was the practice in the Richmond yard to give warning to employees unless a tab or lineup was furnished was insufficient to support a finding to that effect. The rule is well established that the testimony of one witness, if believed by the jury, is sufficient to prove a custom or usage. Robinson v. U. S., 13 Wall. (80 U. S.) 363, 366, 20 L. Ed. 653; Partridge v. Forsyth, 29 Ala. 203; Jones v. Herrick, 141 Iowa, 615, 118 N. W. 444; Vail v. Rice, 5 N. Y. 155, 157; Gleason v. Metropolitan St. Ry. Co., 99 App. Div. 209, 90 N. Y. S. 1025, 1026.

In Jones v. Hoey, 128 Mass. 585, the court said: " * * * There can be no doubt, at the present day, that the circumstance that but one witness testifies to a usage is important only as bearing upon the credibility and satisfactoriness of his testimony in point of fact, and does not affect its competency or its insufficiency as matter of law." The same rule was followed in McDonough v. Boston Elevated Ry. Co., 191 Mass. 509, 78 N. E. 141. As stated by Dean Wigmore in his work on Evidence, § 2053: "The view has been occasionally advanced that a single witness is insufficient to prove the existence of a custom or usage. * * * This rule would today probably not be recognized by any court except by express statute."

[5] While, as urged by appellant, there was nothing unusually hazardous or unsafe in connection with the work done in the railroad yard, it being shown that the plaintiff was instructed when his employment commenced that under the conditions described above he would receive warnings of the movements of cars unless a tab or lineup was furnished, and also that warnings were usual under such circumstances, he had a right to assume that a warning would be given (39 Cor. Jur., Master and Servant, § 573, p. 458, and cases cited); and a failure to give such warning by those in charge of the work constituted negligence (39 Cor. Jur., Master and Servant, sec. 575, p. 459; Missouri, etc., Ry. Co. v. Dereberry [Tex. Civ. App.] 167 S. W. 30; St. Louis, etc., R. Co. v. Dupree, 84 Ark. 377, 105 S. W. 878, 120 Am. St. Rep. 74; Hogan v. Crane Co., 259 Ill. 47, 102 N. E. 215; Russell v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 160 Iowa, 503, 141 N. W. 1077; Winkler v. St. Louis Terminal, etc., Ass'n, 206 Mo. 224, 227 S. W. 625; Grijnuk v. McAdoo, 95 N. J. Law, 256, 113 A. 920; Pinckney v. Atlantic, etc., Ry. Co., 92 S. C. 528, 75 S. E. 964; Atchison, etc., Ry. Co. v. Mills, 49 Tex. Civ. App. 349, 108 S. W. 480; Southern Ry. Co. v. Darnell's Adm'x, 114 Va. 312, 76 S. E. 291; Holman v. St. Louis-San Francisco R. Co., 312 Mo. 342, 278 S. W. 1000).

[6] It is further contended that plaintiff's testimony as to the force with which the cars were struck and the distance they were moved by the impact was incompetent. This claim is based upon the admitted fact that plaintiff was severely injured and suffering great pain; and it is urged that he was consequently not in a condition to make accurate observations. These facts went to the weight and not to the competency of his testimony, and the question of the credit to be given thereto was for the jury. Shimoda v. Bundy, 24 Cal. App. 675, 142 P. 109.

[7, 8] It is also claimed that plaintiff assumed the risk of the dangers attending upon his work; that those dangers were known and appreciated by him, and that he assumed the risk thereof, notwithstanding any assurances given him by the foreman. While plaintiff knew and appreciated the dangers of his position in case cars were switched without warning, nevertheless, in view of the facts and under the circumstances above stated, he had the right to rely upon a warning being given; and, so far as appears, he was not lacking in due care for his own safety. An employee who places himself in a position of danger does not thereby necessarily assume the risk of injury from the want of care of his employer. He has the right to act upon the presumption that the master will exercise ordinary care in the conduct of his business to prevent anything being done which will increase the danger incident to the employment (Morgan v. J. W. Robinson Co., 157 Cal. 348, 107 P. 695); and the question whether he assumed the risk was one for the jury (Hennesey v. Bingham, 125 Cal. 627, 58 P. 200; Morgan v. J. W. Robinson Co., supra).

[9] It is also urged by defendant in the same connection that plaintiff failed to observe a rule of the company requiring employees on or about cars or trains in the yard to place thereon a blue light at night as a warning to advise other employees that such work is being done; or, if the light be omitted, to advise enginemen and the crew that the cars were not to be moved until the completion of the work. According to the plaintiff—and in this he was corroborated by the yardmaster—no such lights were provided or used in the yard; and the requirement that the other employees be advised had never been enforced or observed. The yardmaster also testified in substance that the observance of the rule was impractical. Under such circumstances a failure to observe a rule of the company is no defense to an action by an employee. St. Louis, etc., Ry. Co. v. Caraway, 77 Ark. 405, 91 S. W. 749; Fluhrer v. Lake Shore, etc., Ry. Co., 124 Mich. 482, 83 N. W. 149; Finnegan v. Mo. Pac. Ry. Co., 261 Mo. 481, 169 S. W. 969; Cincinnati, etc., Ry. Co. v. Lovell's Adm'r, 141 Ky. 249, 132 S. W. 569, 47 L. R. A. (N. S.) 909; Canon v. Chicago, etc., Ry. Co., 101 Iowa, 613, 70 N. W. 755; Young v. Lusk, 263 Mo. 625, 187 S. W. 849; Anable v. N. Y. Central, etc., R. R. Co., 138 App. Div. 380, 122 N. Y. S. 713.

[10] There is no merit in the further contention that, in order to avail himself of the promise, express or implied, to warn him of danger, he must have made a complaint of existing conditions and continued in his employment in reliance upon his employer's assurances. In the present case there was no occasion for complaint prior to the accident, as there was no reason for plaintiff to assume that his employer would fail to give warning of the approach of danger.

Lastly, it is charged that, there being a failure to prove actionable negligence, the verdict of the jury was contrary to law, and that the court erred in denying defendant's motions for a nonsuit, a directed verdict, and a new trial. We are satisfied for the reasons stated that the facts show actionable negligence on the part of the defendant; that the conclusions of the jury were fully sustained; and that the several motions by defendant were properly denied.

The judgment is affirmed.

WHITWORTH et al. v. OLIVAS et al.
Civ. 7557.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 1, California.
Dec. 18, 1930.

1. Wills ☞31.

There is no rule of law prescribing average capacity for testamentary act.

2. Wills ☞50.

Testator is of "sound and disposing mind and memory" if he has sufficient mental capacity to understand nature of act, to understand and recollect nature and situation of property, and to remember and understand relations to persons having claims upon bounty.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Sound Mind and Memory," see Words and Phrases.]

3. Wills ☞52(1).

[Presumption is person executing] will was competent to make will, and burden rests upon contestants to prove otherwise.

4. Wills ☞324(2).

In will contest, evidence of testator's mental incapacity to make will held insufficient to require submission to jury.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Edwin F. Hahn, Judge.

HOUSER, J.

This is an appeal from a judgment of nonsuit in a proceeding by which the probate of the last will of the deceased, Arthur Whitworth, was contested.

The only matter in controversy between the litigants herein relates to whether the evidence introduced on the trial of the contest was sufficient to require the submission to the jury of the question of the mental capacity of the testator to make a will.

The substance of the evidence adduced on the hearing of the contest was that the testator was "feeble minded, * * * weak minded; * * * an immature individual; * * * of unsound mind; * * * silly; * * * had the mentality of a boy not over ten years"; he had "a silly expression on his face; acted like a half-wit." That as a boy, although he had attended school for a period of "seven or eight terms," he could read very little; "could not read very good." He read the "Hollywood News"; could not spell and could only write his name. He would answer questions, but he could not carry on a connected conversation; "his answers would be incomplete and meaningless and vague." He was "easily peeved, without cause." That his hands were deformed; "one hand just like a chicken foot;" "he was born with part of his fingers and thumb off; some of his fingers were webbed together; * * * one hand the thumb was off right here, and his first two fingers, and on the other hand he had the little finger and this finger and the thumb, but the thumb was flat." He would meet a stranger and look at him with a kind of grin. He did light work about the ranch, such as feeding the horses and cows; he was not capable of doing heavy work. "He would pitch hay into the horse manger, but never went out into the field to pitch hay. * * * He could drive two horses along very well, but he could not handle more than that; he did not know how to take hold of a six-horse team and plow. He worked in the hay crop during the hay season. * * * He stayed around the place and worked on the ranch in general, like we all did, took care of the barn, took care of the stock, the horses." That for a period of about ten years next preceding his decease he lived with a man named Olivas, where he had a chicken ranch, and also "watched cattle." When he visited either of his brothers, he would say, "I will have to get back to Olivas to take care of the chickens"; or, if he were to remain overnight at the home of either of his brothers, if he so chose, he would sleep in the barn, although he might have occupied a bed in the house. At the time when he started going with Olivas ("as a guess") his estate might have been worth thirty or forty thousand dollars in mortgages and lots; but at the time of his death he was worth between five and six thousand dollars. Although at that time he had $140 in cash, only bread and coffee were found in the place where he had lived. Sometimes one of his brothers would give him $10 or $15 or $20. That he was incapable of attending to his own business; although he "carried a bank account and checked against it when he needed money." He also negotiated "a deal for the job of painting the ranch house." He had some money out at interest. He also owned and managed other properties. That before the Great War one of his brothers, who was an attorney at law, cared for his business interests for him; that he had some cattle, and if he needed a little money and some one came along and offered him any price, "he would be willing to sell it at a sacrifice"; that he would give his money away. "He gave a barber lady enough money to buy a ranch." When an application for letters of guardianship was made for his person and estate, "he stated that if we had a guardian appointed he would kill himself." On occasions when he "went anywhere into town," on his return, if one of his brothers were to inquire where he had been, he would answer, "Huh, what do you want to know for?" And if his brother were to reply that he did not wish to see him throw his money away, he would say, "What is it to you? It ain't your money." When another brother of the testator would try to ask him about his business affairs, he "never got very far with it." The testator would not answer the questions, but would tell him "it was none of his business."

From the foregoing summary of the salient points of the evidence introduced on the hearing of the contest, it may be deduced that the testator was not possessed of the average amount of human intelligence; or, as expressed by one of the witnesses, "he was a feeble minded, or a weak minded, individual," who, perhaps unsuccessfully, attended to his own personal and business affairs.

In its facts the case of Howell v. Taylor, 50 N. J. Eq. 428, 26 A. 566, 567, presented a situation somewhat resembling that in the instant case. Therein it unquestionably appeared that the testator was weak-minded. "He could read and write his name, and, at times converse with some show of intelligence. He also could work in the garden, and aid in harvesting and perform household errands. As to the extent of his capacity to do errands the witnesses differ. Some say that he would indicate that for which he was sent by a single word, or would deliver a slip of paper upon which the name of the article was written, while others testify that he possessed sufficient intelligence to be able fully to state what he wanted, and to pay for that which he obtained. It is also testified that sometimes he would sit listlessly for hours, mumbling and laughing to himself. His expression was vacant; yet, as one witness, a clergyman, says, there was more intelligence than idiocy in it. His articulation was indistinct, and could scarcely be understood by one unaccustomed to it. He rarely answered when spoken to, except by a monosyllable, but his answers were correct. He was docile, never rebellious, and so well behaved that he ate with the family, and remained clean and decently dressed. The income from his estate was usually paid to some member of the Taylor family, upon his signing a receipt for it; yet it is in evidence that at times he had and kept possession of sums of money himself, and discreetly disbursed them. It was not affirmatively and clearly proved that he ever asked or knew about his estate, or that he was able to recollect his kindred, but, at the same time, it was not shown that he was without that knowledge and recollection. By inference it may be gathered that he had some comprehension of his property, and some remembrance of his relatives, who were numerous. He certainly could remember the Taylors and his obligation to them. The order of his intelligence was undoubtedly low; yet it is impossible to say that under favorable circumstances, existing at the very moment of making the will, he did not possess that 'moderate' capacity which is recognized by the court of errors and appeals in Waddington v. Buzby, 45 N. J. Eq. 173, 16 A. 690 [14 Am. St. Rep. 706], as sufficient to validate such a paper."

Other cases where the imbecility of the testator was the issue involved in a contest of his will, and in which a low degree of mentality was shown to have been present, but in each of which the will was upheld, are: Errickson v. Fields, 30 N. J. Eq. 634; Hoban v. Piquette, 52 Mich. 346, 17 N. W. 797; St. Joseph's Convent of Mercy v. Garner, 66 Ark. 623, 53 S. W. 298; Bennett v. Bennett, 50 N. J. Eq. 439, 26 A. 573; Bannatyne v. Bannatyne, 14 Eng. L. & Eq. 581.

[1, 2] In all the cases in which the question of the soundness of mind of the testator is involved the inquiry is limited to a determination of whether at the time of the execution of the will the testator was possessed of testamentary capacity. Nor is such capacity dependable upon a fixed standard of mentality in the testator; not even such as might be rated as an average is demanded. As is remarked in Hoban v. Piquette, 52 Mich. 361, 17 N. W. 797, 804: "There is no rule of law which prescribes average capacity for a testamentary act; if there were it would disabie a large portion of every community—perhaps one-half of it." The rule in California, which has been frequently announced by the courts of this state, is: "A testator is of sound and disposing mind and memory if, at the time of making his will, he has sufficient mental capacity to be able to understand the nature of the act he is doing, to understand and recollect the nature and situation of his property, and to remember and understand his relations to the persons who have claims upon his bounty and whose interests are affected by the provisions of the instrument. Estate of Motz [136 Cal. 558, 69 P. 294], supra; Estate of Dole, 147 Cal. 188, 81 P. 534; Estate of Huston, 163 Cal. 166, 124 P. 852; Estate of De Laveaga, 165 Cal. 607, 133 P. 307; Estate of Casarotti, 184 Cal. 73, 192 P. 1085." Estate of Sexton, 199 Cal. 759, 764, 251 P. 778, 780.

[3] In the contest of a will where the issue presented involves the testamentary capacity of the testator, the outstanding presumption is that the person who executed the will was sane and competent to make such an instrument, and the burden rests upon the contestants to prove otherwise. Estate of Perkins, 195 Cal. 699, 703, 235 P. 45, and authorities there cited.

[4] It would serve no useful purpose to herein consider the conduct, act by act, of the testator, or to attempt a comparison of his intellect with that of either a brilliant or an average mind. The primary questions which are to be given consideration are: Was he possessed of that mentality which enabled him to understand the nature and situation of his property; to remember and to understand his relations to those persons who would be the natural objects of his bounty; and did he realize the nature of the act which he was performing? But of at least equal importance with the determination of such facts is the solution of the further inquiry as to whether the contestants sustained the burden which was cast upon them to prove the negative of such facts. A search of the record herein discloses evidence from which it is clearly inferable that at no time was the testator failing in his knowledge with reference to the nature, situation, or extent of his property. Nor is there the least indication that he was not entirely cognizant of the existence of those persons who, on the death of the testator, ordinarily would be expected to share in his estate. He knew them; had business relations with them; and at all times engaged in friendly social intercourse with them. Far from carrying the burden of showing to the contrary, the evidence introduced by the contestants affirms the legal testamentary capacity of the testator by establishing facts vitally opposed to the ultimate conclusion necessary to a decision of the testator's incompetency. In such circumstances, no error was committed by the trial court in its order by which the motion for nonsuit was granted. (See text and authorities cited in 26 Cal. Jur. 764 et seq.; also Suppl. to same, at p. 1581.)

The judgment is affirmed.

FIRST NAT. TRUST & SAVINGS BANK OF SAN DIEGO v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION et al. ***
Civ. 459.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District,
California.

Dec. 10, 1930.

Rehearing Denied Jan. 5, 1931. Hearing Granted by Supreme Court Feb. 5, 1931.

1. Partnership ⇨63.

In California, partnership is not usually considered as legal entity.

2. Insurance ⇨146(3).

In case of ambiguity, policy should be strictly construed against insurer who prepared it.

3. Partnership ⇨264.

Transfer of interest of any one partner dissolves partnership, no matter how many remain.

4. Insurance ⇨328(9).

Code provision that transfer of interest by one of "several" partners to others does not avoid insurance applies though there are but two partners (Civ. Code, § 2557).

Civ. Code, § 2557, provides that a transfer of interest by one of "several" partners, joint owners, or owners in common, who are jointly insured, to others, does not avoid insurance, notwithstanding agreement that insurance shall cease upon alienation of thing insured. While word "several" sometimes means more than two, it also means different and separate and is often used to designate a number greater than one.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Several," see Words and Phrases.]

5. Insurance ⇨311½.

Provision that transfer of partner's interest to others does not avoid insurance, being remedial, should be liberally construed.

6. Insurance ⇨332¼.

Transfer of interest of one of two insured partners to remaining partner held not to avoid workmen's compensation policy (Civ. Code, § 2557).

7. Insurance ⇨332¼.

Provisions of workmen's compensation policy that liability shall not be affected by employer's death held applicable, where death occurred prior to employee's injury.

8. Insurance ⇨392(8).

Insurer held not estopped, by reason of having sent bill for premium after injury, to deny liability on workmen's compensation policy; record not showing knowledge of facts allegedly constituting defense, or agency of person having knowledge.

9. Insurance ⇨435.

Compensation insurer of bank, as bank, held not liable for injuries sustained by employee in business operated by bank as executor.

Proceedings under the Workmen's Compensation Act by Mabelle Bojens and others, widow and dependent children, for the death of Rinehard Bojens, employee, opposed by the First National Trust & Savings Bank of San Diego, as executor of the estate of Charles Williams Hascall, deceased, employer, the Occidental Indemnity Company, insurer, and others. To review an award of the Industrial Accident Commission in favor of claimants and against employer, dismissing proceedings as to insurer and others, employer petitions for writ of review.

Award annulled and matter referred to Commission for further order consistent with opinion.

James G. Pfanstiel and Eugene Daney, both of San Diego, for petitioner.

Edward O. Allen, of San Francisco, and F. Britton McConnell and Jennings & Belcher, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

BARNARD, J.

This is a petition for a writ of review, seeking to annul an award made by the Industrial Accident Commission.

Charles Hascall and S. W. Powell, as co-partners, were conducting a wholesale and retail cigar store in the city of San Diego. On December 28, 1928, the respondent Occidental Indemnity Company issued to them a standard form workmen's compensation policy, covering the employees of said business from that date until December 28, 1929. About May 1, 1929, Hascall purchased the partnership interest of Powell in said business, and thereafter, until his death, continued to conduct the business under the same name of Hascall & Powell, with no change in the manner of conducting the business, or in the nature of the employment of one Rinehard Bojens, who had been an employee of the partnership. On September 27, 1929, the said Hascall died, and the First National Trust & Savings Bank of San Diego, a corporation, was appointed executor of his estate. The executor continued to operate the cigar store to the end that it might be sold as a going concern. One of the employees of the cigar store was made manager thereof by the executor, at an increased salary, and the other employees, including Bojens, were continued at the same work and at the same salary as before. On November 15, 1929, the said Rinehard Bojens, in the regular course of his employment in said cigar business, received injuries which resulted in blood poisoning and caused his death on January 18, 1930. Shortly after November 15, 1929, one Robert E. Holmes, through whom the Occidental policy was procured, was notified of the injury. After making some investigation, Holmes referred the matter to the respondent Occidental Indemnity Company, which company on December 30, 1929, wrote to an adjuster in San Diego, requesting him to make further investigation, which he did. It is admitted that Holmes knew that Hascall had purchased the partnership interest of Powell shortly after that transaction occurred and also knew that he was continuing the business as sole owner thereof. Also, that Holmes knew of the death of Hascall within a few days after it occurred, and prior to the date Bojens was injured. On December 27, 1929, respondent Occidental Indemnity Company issued a statement, addressed to Holmes, calling for an additional premium, based upon the wages actually paid by the business during the entire policy year, including the period during which the business was operated by Hascall alone and also the period during which the business was operated by the executor. The amount of this additional premium was paid by the executor to Holmes on January 6, 1930. It also appears that upon the expiration of the policy year on December 28, 1929, the policy was renewed for another year. The First National Trust & Savings Bank of San Diego carried a workmen's compensation policy with the respondent the Fidelity & Casualty Company of New York, which policy was written for the benefit of all of the employees of the bank, as set forth in said policy. After a hearing, with various continuances, the respondent Industrial Accident Commission made an award in the amount of $5,000 in favor of the dependent wife and children of Bojens, and found that the First National Trust & Savings Bank of San Diego, executor of the estate of Charles Williams Hascall, deceased, was the employer of the said Bojens at the time of his injury, and that said employer was not insured. An order was also made dismissing the proceedings as to the First National Trust & Savings Bank individually, as to the Fidelity & Casualty Company of New York, a corporation, and as to Occidental Indemnity Company, a corporation. A petition for a rehearing was later denied by the Industrial Accident Commission.

It is conceded by all parties that the dependent wife and children of Bojens are entitled to the award made, the only question raised being as to who should pay the same. It is also conceded that the insurance policy issued by the Occidental Indemnity Company was in full force and effect at the time of the injury, unless the same had been avoided either by the transfer of the interest of S. W.

Powell to Charles Hascall, or by his subsequent death and the continuance of the business by his executor. In behalf of the respondents, it is urged that in the policy referred to the Occidental Indemnity Company insured a particular entity, namely, the partnership of Hascall & Powell, and that at the time of his fatal injuries Bojens was not the employee of this entity, but was the employee of the trust company in its capacity as executor; it being urged that the employer, within the meaning of the policy, was twice changed after the policy was issued.

"Name of this Employer Charles Hascall and S. W. Powell, d. b. a. Hascall & Powell

"P. O. Address

1072-4th Street, San Diego, California.
Street City or Town

"For the purpose of serving notice, as in the policy provided, this Employer agrees that this address may be considered as both the residence and business address of this Employer or any representative upon whom notice may be served.

"Individual, co-partnership, corporation or estate? Co-partnership."

It will be noted that under "Name of this Employer," there are set forth two names, who are described as "doing business as Hascall & Powell." In paragraph 1 (a) of the policy the company agrees with this employer to pay to any person entitled thereto under the Workmen's Compensation Law the entire amount of any sum due. It will be noted that the policy, in naming the employer, names two individuals who are not even described as a copartnership. It does not specify that the partnership, as an entity, is named as the employer. While a little further down there appears a description as a copartnership, this is not included under the name of the employer. Not only does the policy fail to specify that the employer insured is a copartnership, as an entity, but in this state a partnership is not usually considered a legal entity. 20 Cal. Jur. 680; People v. Maljan, 34 Cal. App. 384, 167 P. 547; Woodward v. McAdam, 101 Cal. 439, 35 P. 1016. The point relied upon by respondents as freeing the Occidental Indemnity Company from liability under this policy is a most technical one. If we are to be extremely technical in interpreting this policy, it would seem that, strictly speaking, in naming the employer, this policy has insured two individuals, Charles Hascall and S. W. Powell, while they are doing business as Hascall & Powell. In other words, they are each insured while doing business under that firm name. While one of them dropped out of the business, the other continued to run the same business in the same manner and in the same name, so that not even such an increase of risk could be claimed, as might have occurred if a new personality had been brought into the business. Strictly interpreted, the policy insured either Charles Hascall or S. W. Powell while doing business as Hascall & Powell. If an ambiguity exists, an insurance policy should be strictly construed against the insurer who prepared it. Welch v. British American, etc., Co., 148 Cal. 223, 82 P. 964, 113 Am. St. Rep. 223, 7 Ann. Cas. 396. Had this insurance company desired to insure only this copartnership as an entity, it could have been easily so designated in naming the employer.

[3-6] In any event, we feel that section 2557 of the Civil Code applies. This section reads as follows: "A transfer of interest by one of several partners, joint owners, or owners in common, who are jointly insured, to the others, does not avoid an insurance, even though it has been agreed that the insurance shall cease upon an alienation of the thing insured."

That section applies to all kinds of insurance. Civ. Code, § 2534. Respondents insist that this section does not apply, but should be interpreted in connection with the entire Code, particularly in connection with the provisions with respect to dissolution of copartnerships. It is urged that by these latter provisions, a transfer from one of only two partners to the other, effects a dissolution of the partnership, and that section 2557 was meant to apply only when there are more than two partners, and where the partnership would not be dissolved by the transfer of the interest of one to the others remaining. If that were the case, section 2557 would have no meaning in respect to partnerships because, by the law of partnership, the transfer of the interest of any one partner dissolves the partnership, no matter how many partners remain. It is also urged that the word "several" in section 2557 means more than two. While that is one meaning of the word, there are also other meanings, such as, different and separate. The word is often used to designate a number greater than one. The section refers not only to partners, but to joint owners or owners in common. And in speaking of such owners, no reason appears why the beneficent provisions of the section should be limited to cases where more than two are involved. It seems to us that the object and purpose of the section is to provide for a perfectly natural and just situation, and that it was intended to apply to such a transfer by one of two or more such parties. The section is unquestionably remedial, and for the benefit of the insured, and as such, should be liberally construed. This section of the Civil Code was a part of this insurance contract. General Acc., etc., Corp. v. Indus. Acc. Comm., 196 Cal. 179, 237 P. 33. We are therefore of the opinion that the transfer of the interest of S. W. Powell in this business to Charles Hascall did not avoid this policy and that Charles Hascall continued as the employer named in the policy up to his death.

[7] Among the conditions of the policy in question, section D reads as follows: "The obligations of paragraph one (a) foregoing are hereby declared to be the direct obligations and promises of the Company to any injured employee covered hereby, or, in the event of his death, to his dependents; and to each such employee or such dependent the Company is hereby made directly and primarily liable under said obligations and promises. This contract is made for the benefit of such employees or such dependents and is enforceable against the Company, by any such employee or such dependent in his name or on his behalf, at any time and in any manner permitted by law, whether claims or proceedings are brought against the Company alone or jointly with this Employer. If the law of any state in which the policy is applicable provides for the enforcement of the rights of such employees or such dependents by any commission, board or other state agency for the benefit of such employees or such dependents, then the provisions of such law are made a part hereof, as respects any matter subject thereto, as fully as if written herein. The obligations and promises of the Company as set forth in this paragraph shall not be affected by the failure of this Employer to do or refrain from doing any act required by the policy; nor by any default of this Employer after the accident in the payment of premiums or in the giving of any notice required by the policy or otherwise; nor by the death, insolvency, bankruptcy, legal incapacity or inability of this Employer, nor by any proceeding against him as a result of which the conduct of this Employer's business may be and continue to be in charge of an executor, administrator, receiver, trustee, assignee, or other person."

Charles Hascall being, up to the time of his death, the employer of Bojens, the section of the policy just quoted not only makes the insurance company directly and primarily liable to Bojens for the obligations of paragraph 1 (a) thereof, which was to pay the amount due to his dependents under the Workmen's Compensation Law, but the last sentence of the paragraph quoted provides that this obligation and promise of the company shall not be affected by the death of this employer, nor by any proceedings as a result of which this employer's business should continue in charge of an executor. It is argued by the respondent Occidental Indemnity Company that this provision only applies and refers to a death of an employer, and the administration of his estate, taking place after the injury to the employee. We think this position cannot be maintained. Such an interpretation would make the clause meaningless, as the liability of the insurance company would, in the absence of this provision in the policy, become fixed at the date of an injury occurring during the life of the employer, and would not be affected by his later death. Moreover, the policy specifically refers to "after the accident" in the second clause preceding this one, but makes no such reference in the clause in question. We conclude, therefore, that under the law and the provisions of this particular policy, it was still in force at the date of the injury to Bojens, and that respondent Occidental Indemnity Company was responsible for the payment of the award. It follows, therefore, that the finding of the commission that the employer was uninsured at the time of the injury is not supported by the evidence.

[8] An attempt is made by petitioner to establish that respondent Occidental Indemnity Company is estopped to deny its liability by reason of having sent out a bill for an additional premium, after the date of the injury to Bojens. While the record shows that Holmes, through whom the policy was originally secured, had knowledge of the transfer of Powell's interest in the business to Hascall, and later of the death of Hascall, the record fails to show that Holmes was an agent of the Occidental Indemnity Company and nothing appears in the record to definitely show knowledge upon the part of the insurance company itself, prior to December 30, 1929.

[9] In reference to the respondent the Fidelity & Casualty Company of New York, the terms of its policy show that it had insured the First National Trust & Savings Bank of San Diego in its capacity as a bank, but that it had not insured such bank while acting in the capacity of an executor, and, as such, running an independent business.

The equities are with the petitioner in this proceeding. While Holmes testified that he was a broker, and he was not clearly shown to have been the agent of this insurance company, the general situation was one that might easily mislead an employer. The insurance company received its premium, the risk was not increased, the executor paid the additional premium covering the entire year, and the policy was renewed at its expiration. Holmes having been informed of the changes, it was a natural thing to rely on the policy as continuing. While the knowledge of Holmes was not definitely fastened upon the company, the circumstances are such as to further justify the rule that a contract should be strictly interpreted against the party who drew it.

For the reasons set forth, the award of the Industrial Accident Commission is annulled, and the matter is referred to said commission for a further order, consistent with the views herein expressed.

Code Civ. Proc. § 378 provides that all persons may be joined in one action as plaintiffs who have interest in subject of action or in whom any right to relief in respect to or arising out of same "transaction" is alleged to exist, where, if such persons brought separate actions, any question of law or fact would arise which is common to all parties to action.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Transaction," see Words and Phrases.]

2. Action ⚡50(3).

There was no misjoinder because all persons riding in automobile colliding with defendant's automobile united in one action for injuries (Code Civ. Proc. § 378).

3. Justices of the peace ⚡43(1).

Word "case" in statute respecting justice court's jurisdiction means state of facts constituting cause of action submitted for judicial decision and is synonymous with "cause of action" in contradistinction to action itself (Code Civ. Proc. § 112).

Code Civ. Proc. § 112 gave justices' court jurisdiction in all "cases" at law in which demand in controversy amounted to $1,000 or less.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Case" and "Cause of Action," see Words and Phrases.]

4. Justices of the peace ⚡44(9).

Where none of plaintiffs suing for personal injuries made demand for more than $1,000, but total of demands was $3,950, and amounts awarded totaled $1,140, justice court had jurisdiction (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 112, 378).

The five separate cases joined did not combine to form a new "case" within meaning of Code Civ. Proc. § 112, giving justices' court jurisdiction in all "cases" at law in which demand in controversy amounted to $1,000 or less, because they were united in comprehensive complaint for purposes of trial under section 378, permitting joinder of persons as plaintiffs.

COLLA et al. v. CARMICHAEL U-DRIVE AUTOS, Inc., et al.
Civ. 38.

Appellate Department, Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco, California.
Dec. 10, 1930.

1. Action ⚡50(3).

Term "transaction" in statute respecting joinder of persons as plaintiffs includes in its meaning tortious or delictual doings (Code Civ. Proc. § 378).

Appeal from Justices' Court, City and County of San Francisco; I. Harris, Justice of the Peace.

Action by Thomas Colla and others against Carmichael U-Drive Autos, Inc., and another. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal.

Affirmed.

Barry J. Colding and Theodore Hale, both of San Francisco, and B. P. Gibbs, of Los Angeles, for appellant Carmichael U-Drive Autos, Inc.

Heller, Ehrman, White & McAuliffe, of San Francisco, for appellant Richard Sheldon.

John J. McMahon, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

JOHNSON, P. J.

This action was begun in San Francisco in the justice's court on September 26, 1929, at which time the statute gave that court jurisdiction in all cases at law in which the demand in controversy amounted to $1,000 or less (Code of Civil Procedure, § 112). Judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiffs on June 13, 1930, before the merger of the justices' court into the present municipal court, which became effective on July 1, 1930.

The defendants attack the judgment solely on the ground that there was a misjoinder of the parties plaintiff, and that the amount of the demands in controversy, exceeding $1,000 in the aggregate, deprived the justices' court of jurisdiction.

The action grew out of a collision between an automobile driven by the plaintiff Thomas Evola and another automobile driven by the defendant Sheldon, and hired by him from his codefendant. The plaintiffs Colla, Montalbano, Silva, and Jennie Evola were riding with Thomas Evola as his guests; and the plaintiffs having suffered personal injury by reason of the collision, which they attributed to the negligence of the defendant Sheldon, they joined in one complaint for recovery of their several damages.

The complaint is in five counts, setting forth distinctively the respective causes of action of the five plaintiffs, with a statement in each count of the damage sustained by the individual in whose behalf the claim is made. And the prayer of the complaint is not for the gross damages of all the plaintiffs, but asks a separate award to each for the damage suffered individually in accordance with the averments of the several counts.

Thus Colla sought recovery of $1,000; Thomas Evola of $900; Montalbano of $750; Silva of $500; and Jennie Evola of $800. These amounts aggregate $3,950.

After hearing the evidence the trial court gave a judgment for plaintiffs, awarding Colla $140; Thomas Evola $224; Montalbano $60; Silva $168; and Jennie Evola $548; these amounts totaling $1,140.

If the awards sought by the complaint as a whole had not exceeded $1,000, there could scarcely be a dispute over the right of the plaintiffs, all injured in the same collision, to join in one action.

[1] Section 378 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides: "All persons may be joined in one action as plaintiffs who have an interest in the subject of the action or in whom any right to relief in respect to or arising out of the same transaction or series of transactions is alleged to exist, whether jointly, severally or in the alternative, where if such persons brought separate actions any question of law or fact would arise which are common to all the parties to the action; * * * and judgment may be given for such one or more of the plaintiffs as may be found to be entitled to relief, for the relief to which he or they may be entitled."

The term "transaction" as here used is not limited in meaning to a commercial negotiation or contract, but includes tortious or delictual doings as well. In Bliss on Code Pleading, § 125, the word is said to embrace "any occurrence between parties that may become the foundation of an action"; and in Glide v. Kayser, 142 Cal. 419, 420, 76 P. 50, the Supreme Court recognized that the word is comprehensive in meaning, and, as used in section 442 of the Code of Civil Procedure, might permit a cross-complaint in an action founded on tort. The broad scope of the term is exhibited in the definition taken from the law dictionaries and adopted in Scarborough v. Smith, 18 Kan. 406, which is in these words: "Whatever may be done by one person which affects another's rights, and out of which a cause of action may arise" is a "transaction."

[2] We conclude, therefore, that the collision of the two automobiles was a transaction, out of which arose questions of law and of fact common to all the injured plaintiffs. Hence, there was no misjoinder because they united in one action instead of instituting five separate actions.

Speaking of the corresponding provision of the New York Practice Act, the Court of Appeals in Akely v. Kinnicutt, 238 N. Y. 466, 144 N. E. 682, 683, said: "Its purpose is to lessen the delay and expense of litigation by permitting the claims of different plaintiffs to be decided in one action instead of many, when, although legally separate and distinct, they nevertheless so involve common questions, and spring out of identical or related transactions, that their common trial may be had with fairness to the different parties." See, also, S. L. & Co. v. Bock, 118 Misc. Rep. 756, 194 N. Y. S. 773, and Metropolitan Cas. Ins. Co. v. Lehigh Valley Ry. Co., 94 N. J. Law, 236, 109 A. 743.

The more serious question is that of jurisdiction.

The amount in controversy is usually determined for jurisdictional purposes by the ad damnum clause of the complaint. 7 Cal. Jur. 692. In this instance, as has already been remarked, the complaint prayed for separate awards to the respective plaintiffs, each of whom set the damages individually claimed at not more than $1,000.

The court's jurisdiction extended to "all cases at law in which the demand * * * amounts to one thousand dollars or less." Must we then treat the entire complaint as a statement of a single "case" rather than of several "cases" incorporated, in the interest of administrative efficiency, in a formal presentation of the causes of the several complainants in one instrument for the purpose of a joint trial upon common questions of law and of fact?

In solving this question, it should be borne in mind that section 378 and other related sections of the Code of Civil Procedure were adopted in 1927 for the very purpose of lessening delays, bettering procedure, and expediting the final disposition of controversies. Joerger v. Pacific Gas & Electric Co., 207 Cal. 8, 19, 276 P. 1017. These plaintiffs might have brought five separate actions; and actions so brought might have been consolidated for trial. On the other hand, if begun at intervals, they might have taken the time of five judges to hear repetition of substantially the same evidence with perhaps confusing results. It is assuredly far more sensible and expeditious, and far less expensive to the litigants, to determine the merits of the entire controversy upon a single set of pleadings and at one hearing. The defendants say that this ought not to have been done because the demands in the aggregate exceeded $1,000. We are of the opinion however that the five separate "cases" did not combine to form a new "case" because they were united in a comprehensive complaint for purposes of trial.

[3] The word "case," as used in law, is defined in the Standard Dictionary as "a state of facts constituting a cause of action submitted for judicial decision." And in Calderwood v. Peyser, 42 Cal. 110, 115, it is said that: "A case is a state of facts which furnishes occasion for the exercise of the jurisdiction of a court of justice." The term is to be treated then as synonymous with "cause of action," in contradistinction to the action itself.

In the complaint filed, each "case" or cause of action preserved its identity, and each plaintiff prayed for and obtained a segregated award based on the damages individually proved. The code section contemplates of course an action single in form, but with each "case" or demand retaining its distinctive identity as though pleaded in an independent action. No plaintiff is interested in the entire complaint. The interest of each is in his own "case" or cause of action; and the complaint as a whole is merely a series of "cases" embodied in one document.

The institution of a joint action thus amounts to an election to consolidate at the outset several causes of action for trial instead of bringing several actions based on common grounds, and then having them consolidated later.

Such is the prevailing, though not unanimous, construction given to the corresponding section of the New York Practice Act.

In Dilworth v. Yellow Taxi Corp., 127 Misc. Rep. 543, 216 N. Y. S. 513, 515, five plaintiffs, as here, joined in an action in the Municipal Court to recover damages for personal injuries. The cause of each plaintiff was separately stated with demand for an individual award; but, because the aggregate of the amounts prayed exceeded the jurisdictional limit of $1,000, the Municipal Court denied the plaintiff's motion to set the case for trial. This order was reversed on appeal to the Appellate Term of the Supreme Court, where it was held that the several causes of action did not merge into a new and single cause, but that each retained its identity; and that "the joinder does not lose to either the plaintiffs or the defendants the rights or privileges which each would have had if separate actions had been brought." The defendant then appealed from the decision of the Appellate Term to the Appellate Division, Second Department, which, with two of the five judges dissenting, reversed the decision of the Appellate Term in a memorandum, stating: "There was only one action and but one summons, and the amount demanded in that summons exceeded $1,000. The Municipal Court, therefore, was without jurisdiction." Dilworth v. Yellow Taxi Corp., 220 App. Div. 772, 221 N. Y. S. 813. It is to be noted here that the Municipal Court was established before the adoption of section 209 of the Practice Act.

This ruling was followed by the City Court of New York in Weis v. Richartz, 130 Misc. Rep. 583, 224 N. Y. S. 416, where father and minor son joined in a complaint embodying two causes of action, one for injury to the son, the other for recompense to the father for loss of the son's services and for cost of medical care. In that case the complaint, instead of praying for separate awards, demanded damages in the gross amount of $4,000. This amount being beyond the jurisdictional limit of $3,000, the court ruled in accordance with the final decision in the Dilworth Case and dismissed the complaint.

These cases were, however, distinguished in Dobrikin v. Union Ry. Co., 130 Misc. Rep. 796, 225 N. Y. S. 376, 377, which came to a hearing shortly afterwards in the City Court of New York. In that case, husband and wife joined in a complaint containing two causes of action; one on behalf of the wife for personal injuries, the other on behalf of the husband for loss of service and medical expense. Each plaintiff demanded a separate award of $3,000. The court, there asserting its jurisdiction, said: "I further believe that this court must entertain jurisdiction of a case, where several parties are joined in a complaint as plaintiffs, because of common questions of fact or law involved, where each plaintiff separately states his cause of action and demands separate judgment, in an amount not exceeding $3,000, although the aggregate demand * * * would be in excess of $3,000." And the court expressed the view that, inasmuch as the act establishing the City Court was passed after the adoption of section 209 of the Practice Act, it was to be presumed that the word "complaint," as used in the creative statute, was meant to be applied, in case of joinder of plaintiffs under section 209, not to all the causes of action collectively but to the several causes distributively.

The court further declared that it did not feel bound by the Dilworth decision, since in that case the Appellate Division had been dealing with the definition of the word "complaint" as applied to the Municipal Court in a statute adopted before the enactment of the Practice Act. Upon this point the court said: "When the Legislature used the word 'complaint' then, it had the ordinary meaning then in use. But when the Legislature and the people used the word 'complaint,' after the enactment of section 209, Civil Practice Act, it had the natural and ordinary meaning that it should have, in the light of the modernizing of the law of procedure."

As to the case of Weis v. Richartz, 130 Misc. Rep. 583, 224 N. Y. S. 416, the court pointed out that the test of jurisdiction was the sum demanded, and that the two plaintiffs joining in that action, though separately alleging their respective damages, had demanded judgment, not separately, but jointly in the sum of $4,000.

The question of jurisdiction was again presented in Spetler v. Jogel Realty Co., 224 App. Div. 612, 231 N. Y. S. 517. This case likewise arose in the City Court; and three plaintiffs who had all been injured in the same accident joined in a complaint in four counts with a separate demand of $3,000 upon each count.

Upon a judgment for specific sums in favor of the plaintiffs severally, the defendant took an appeal to the Appellate Term of the Supreme Court, which, following the memorandum decision of the Appellate Division, Second Department, in the Dilworth Case, reversed the judgment for want of jurisdiction in the City Court. The plaintiffs then prosecuted an appeal to the Appellate Division, First Department, which, instead of accepting the ruling of the Second Department in the Dilworth Case, unanimously approved and followed the opinion rendered in the City Court itself in Dobrikin v. Union Ry. Co., 130 Misc. Rep. 796, 225 N. Y. S. 376, and accordingly reversed the determination of the Appellate Term and affirmed the judgment of the City Court.

Thereafter, in Sirov v. Bernard Greenwood Co., 134 Misc. Rep. 836, 236 N. Y. S. 588, upon a motion in the Municipal Court to dismiss for lack of jurisdiction, that court elected to govern itself by the decision of the First Department of the Appellate Division in the Spetler Case in preference to the earlier decision of the Second Department in the Dilworth Case; and the motion to dismiss was therefore denied.

[4] Under our own statute, we are not confronted with the technical meaning to be ascribed to the word "complaint." The jurisdiction of our justices' and likewise our municipal courts extends to "cases" in which the demand does not exceed a specified maximum; and, when there is a joinder under section 378 of the Code of Civil Procedure, we are of the view that the "case" of each plaintiff is his individual cause of action and demand. And though the aggregate of the amounts demanded by the plaintiffs severally exceeds the jurisdictional maximum of a single "case," yet if the individual demands are each within the prescribed monetary limit, no constitutional or statutory inhibition bars the plaintiffs from enjoyment of the privileges accorded by the Code section. This view finds confirmation under a different situation in Winrod v. Wolters, 141 Cal. 399, 74 P. 1037, 1038. That was an action instituted in the Superior Court by several laborers, each having an individual claim of less than $300. At that time actions on contract in which the demand did not amount to $300 had to be brought in the justices' court. Judgment in the Superior Court having gone in favor of the plaintiffs in their joint action, the defendants moved to quash the writ of execution issued upon the judgment. That motion having been granted, the plaintiffs appealed to the Supreme Court. Upon that appeal the order quashing the execution was affirmed, the court saying: "The complaint in this action shows affirmatively that no plaintiff has a claim against the corporation defendant equal to or greater than $300. It also shows that plaintiffs had no joint interest in the aggregate of their claims, but that each had a separate claim, and was entitled only to a separate judgment against the corporation for the amount of his claim. The court, therefore, had no power to enter the joint judgment that it did enter, and the several claims each being less than $300, no jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action. The judgment was therefore void on the face of the record, and the execution likewise void."

At the time when the present action was brought, the plaintiffs had the right to avail themselves of the advantages given by section 378 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and the jurisdiction of the justices' court had been extended to cases involving as much as $1,000. Since none of the plaintiffs made demand for more than $1,000, the justices' court, under the ruling in Winrod v. Wolters, supra, was the only court in which plaintiffs could seek their remedy; and if action had been begun in the Superior Court, any judgment there rendered in favor of plaintiffs would have been void on its face and hence uncollectible.

We conclude therefore that the judgment is not subject to attack on jurisdictional grounds; and, there being sufficient evidence in its support, the judgment is affirmed.

PRETZER v. CALIFORNIA TRANSIT CO.
L. A. 12440.

Supreme Court of California.

Dec. 29, 1930.

Rehearing Denied Jan. 26, 1931.

1. Automobiles ⇨244(36).

Evidence showed that bus driver's negligence proximately caused collision with approaching automobile when bus turned out to pass another vehicle.

2. Appeal and error ⇨1068(3).

Instructions regarding negligence, contributory negligence, and proximate cause of automobile collision, if erroneous, were harmless, where evidence established defendant's negligence as sole cause.

3. Damages ⇨99.

In personal injury action, value of cotton crop being grown under plaintiff's supervision was improper measure of damages (Const. art. 6, § 4½).

The evidence showed that at the time of the automobile collision, wherein plaintiff received the injuries for which he sought recovery in the present action, he had been employed to superintend 1,000 acres of growing cotton, and had also been raising 2,500 acres of cotton on his own account, his duties consisting solely of superintending the work. He was permitted to testify that if he had not been injured he would have caused his crop to be irrigated; that the cotton had consequently suffered from a lack of water; and that if a normal crop had been produced it would have been worth about $200,000.

4. Damages ⇨214.

Instruction that injured plaintiff should minimize damages, and could not recover for failure to return to work when reasonably able, was improperly refused.

Plaintiff testified that he did not return to the performance of his duties for almost eight months after the automobile accident in which he had been injured, but there was evidence that he was able to perform part of his duties within five weeks, and that he had almost entirely recovered at the end of three months.

5. Damages ⇨32.

Plaintiff sustaining fractured arm, necessitating reduction by fluoroscopy and encasing arm and torso in plaster cast for five weeks, could recover for pain and suffering.

6. Appeal and error ⇨1178(6).

Court of Appeal can reverse judgment and remand for new trial solely upon issue of damages (Const. art. 6, § 4½) Theodore M. Stuart, of Fresno, for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

After a careful reconsideration of this cause, we are pleased to adopt the following opinion of Mr. Acting Presiding Justice Marks of the Fourth Appellate District, as the opinion of this court in bank herein:

[1] On August 11, 1928, respondent was riding with his son, Ed Pretzer, his wife, and a Mrs. Margaret McCarthy, in a Ford sedan, traveling east on White's Bridge road, a county road running in a general easterly and westerly direction in the county of Fresno, state of California. At a place on the road about one and a half miles westerly from the city limits of the city of Fresno, the Ford sedan, which was being driven by Ed Pretzer, came into collision with a motor-driven passenger stage belonging to appellant, and being operated by its servant. Respondent was injured in the accident and was awarded damages in the sum of $12,000 after a trial before a jury.

According to the evidence the passenger stage was traveling west on the White's Bridge road. Preceding it was a bakery truck traveling in the same direction. When the Ford sedan, occupied by respondent and his party, had approached the bakery truck so that only between thirty-five and sixty feet intervened between these two vehicles, the stage of appellant swung to the left from behind the bakery truck and directly in the path of the Ford sedan. When Ed Pretzer saw the stage in front of him on the south half of the highway he immediately applied his brakes and swung his car slightly to the left and then to the right, hoping to avoid a collision. The stage driver did the same thing and finally drove toward his left side of the road, so that at the time of the collision the stage was headed in a southwesterly direction with its front wheels off the south edge of the pavement and with part of the body of the stage and its rear wheels on the south half of the pavement. The Ford hit the stage back of its center on its right-hand side, tearing the right fenders and right running board from the sedan. Respondent was sitting in the right front seat of the Ford with the window in the door open and his right elbow protruding outside the car. The force of the collision broke respondent's right arm between the elbow and the shoulder and lacerated the skin and flesh on the arm and hand. He also received a superficial scalp wound and was rendered unconscious for a few hours. Neither of the vehicles involved in the accident was traveling at an excessive rate of speed. With the exception of the driver of the stage, all of the witnesses testifying, including passengers in the stage, described the collision as we have here set it forth.

The stage driver testified that when he attempted to pass the bakery truck the Ford sedan was at least fifteen hundred feet down the road and in front of the truck; that the bakery truck increased its speed, and that the stage and the truck proceeded side by side for about two hundred feet when he saw that a collision was imminent and attempted to drive the stage off the pavement and to the south side of the road. As we have observed, the testimony of this witness stands entirely alone. It is not consistent. His estimate of the speed of the Ford sedan was that it was traveling only slightly faster than the bakery truck and the stage. If, as this witness testified, the bakery truck and the stage traveling side by side only covered two hundred feet, it would have been impossible for the Ford, traveling at the rate of speed fixed by the stage driver, to have covered the remaining thirteen hundred feet and reached the scene of the accident in the length of time that the other two vehicles were traversing the two hundred feet side by side.

While appellant sets forth many assignments of error upon which it relies for a reversal of the judgment, these assignments fall into two general classes: First, those concerning contributory negligence on the part of respondent and his son, the driver of the sedan, and, second, those concerning the size of the verdict by which respondent was awarded damages in the sum of $12,000.

The errors complained of concerning the alleged contributory negligence of respondent and his son relate principally to instructions given by the court, and other instructions proposed by appellant and refused by the court. Some of the instructions given and complained of are inartistic and might have been improved upon. However, the jury was correctly instructed upon the question of negligence, contributory negligence, and proximate cause. The evidence in this case so conclusively shows negligence on the part of the driver of appellant's stage, and that this negligence was the sole and proximate cause of the injury unaffected by any act or omission of either respondent or his son, that the jury could do nothing else than conclude that appellant was solely responsible for the injury to respondent.

[2] The record fails to disclose any suggestion of contributory negligence on the part of either respondent or his son, therefore we conclude that if there were any errors in the instructions given or refused by the court on the question of negligence, contributory negligence and proximate cause of the injury they were harmless and not prejudicial and are not grounds for a reversal of the judgment, as any verdict that did not fix responsibility for the accident upon appellant because of the negligence of its servant would have been contrary to the evidence.

Upon the question of errors of the court affecting the amount of damages awarded to respondent, we are confronted with a more difficult problem. The amount of $12,000 is large considering the injuries of respondent.

Respondent was taken to a hospital in the city of Fresno, where his broken arm was set and his other injuries dressed. On the day following the accident his physician discovered that the broken bones in the arm had slipped, requiring that it be reset. Respondent was then taken to the office of his physician in the city of Madera and the fracture was again reduced by the aid of the fluoroscope. The arm was placed in a position at right angles to the body with the forearm extended to the front and held in position upon an ordinary hardware bracket. The entire arm and body from below the waist to the neck were encased in a plaster cast, which was not removed for about five weeks. This means of reducing a fracture was painful and undoubtedly caused respondent considerable suffering. However, respondent was not confined to his bed after the second reduction of the fracture. He walked from the doctor's office and was taken to the home of his sister in an automobile. He visited the doctor's office on frequent occasions during the ensuing two weeks, walking up and down a flight of stairs to and from the office. About two weeks after the accident he returned to his home at Knights Landing, near Sacramento, Cal., returning two or three times during the next three weeks to consult his physician, after which time the cast was removed and he was discharged from the care of his physician.

At the trial, which took place about eight months after the accident, respondent's physician testified that there was a slight impairment in the rotation of respondent's right arm, but that this would disappear within about a year from the time of the injury. No claim of any permanent injuries to respondent was made.

[3] At the time of the accident respondent was engaged in farming thirty-five hundred acres of cotton near Knights Landing in Sacramento county, Cal. He was employed by the California Cotton Credits Corporation to superintend one thousand acres of growing cotton at a salary of $400 per month. Respondent was raising twenty-five hundred acres of cotton on his own account. His duties consisted solely of superintending the work of growing these crops and in directing the efforts of laborers employed to do the actual work upon them. There is evidence that the reasonable value of such services was the sum of $1,000 per month. Respondent was totally disabled for five weeks, and according to the testimony was partially disabled for several weeks longer. After the lapse of the first several weeks he might have resumed the duties of superintending the growing of his cotton crop. He was not reemployed by the California Cotton Credits Corporation, which stopped his wages on the day of the accident.

Over appellant's objection, respondent was permitted to testify that in the event of his not being injured he would have had his cotton crop irrigated during this time of his total disability, but that on account of the injuries this irrigation did not take place and the crop suffered from a lack of water. Over like objection he was permitted to testify that if a normal crop were produced on thirty-five hundred acres of land under the conditions existing in 1928, such crop would have amounted to about three-fourths of a bale per acre and would have had a total value of about $200,000. Upon what theory this evidence was admitted does not appear from the record. One thousand acres of the cotton belonged to the California Cotton Credits Corporation and not to him. The value of the crop on this land made no difference to him financially. He was receiving a salary of $400 per month for superintending its growing. If the crop had been a total failure the loss would have fallen on the corporation and not on respondent.

The value of the crops grown under the supervision of respondent was no proper measure of the damages suffered by him as a result of his injuries, as he superintended the growing of the crops and employed laborers to do the actual work of caring for them. As the Supreme Court said in the case of Lombardi v. California Street Railway Co., 124 Cal. 311, 57 P. 66, 69:

"The loss of profits in conducting a business involving the labor of others is not a necessary consequence of personal injury to the plaintiff. The extent of his recovery upon this ground would be what his services were worth in the conduct of such a business as he was engaged in."

To the same effect are the cases of Walsh v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co., 204 N. Y. 58, 97 N. E. 408, 37 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1137, and Lo Schiavo v. Northern Ohio T. & L. Co., 106 Ohio St. 61, 138 N. E. 372, 27 A. L. R. 424.

Respondent introduced evidence that the reasonable value of his services was the sum of $1,000 per month. The evidence as to the value of the cotton crop was dangerous because it might tend to lead the jury to believe that the actual damage to respondent was not only the loss of the reasonable value of his services, but also a very material injury to the valuable crops. Whether or not the crop actually produced was a normal one does not appear. Appellant proposed an instruction intended to attempt to cure this error, which instruction was refused by the court. It should have been given.

[4] Respondent testified that he did not return to work and to the performance of his duties for almost eight months after his injury. There is a strong inference from the evidence that he was able to perform part of his duties as soon as the cast was removed. His attending physician testified that he was able to attend to his duties three months after the injury. Appellant proposed the following instruction, which was refused by the court:

"The plaintiff is under a duty to minimize his damages in every way that he can reasonably do so, and when he was reasonably able to return to his work, whether he did so return at that time or not is immaterial, and his damage for loss of time in attending his crop would terminate at that time."

This instruction should have been given. The rule is well stated in 8 California Jurisprudence, 782, as follows:

"It is the duty of one who knows he is threatened with detriment, either in person, property or business, through another's breach of contract or tort, to do all that he reasonably can to prevent or minimize the damage, and if he negligently fails to do this, he cannot recover for what he might have prevented."

It was held in Baker v. Borello, 136 Cal. 160, 68 P. 591, 593, as follows:

"A party injured by the tort of another must not, by his negligence or willfulness, allow the damages to be unnecessarily enhanced; and, if he does so, he cannot recover for the increased loss."

[5] Respondent was totally disabled for five weeks after his injury. He was partially disabled for several weeks thereafter. He suffered more pain than would follow from a fractured arm that could be reduced in the ordinary way and is entitled to compensation for pain and suffering. The damages awarded were large for the injuries suffered, and we cannot say that the errors we have pointed out did not directly tend to increase the amount of the verdict. We cannot hold, therefore, that these errors were not prejudicial to appellant on the question of the amount of the damages awarded. Under the circumstances of this case these particular errors affecting the amount of the verdict cannot be disregarded under the provisions of section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution of California.

[6] As we have seen, the record before us leaves no doubt in our minds that the negligence of the driver of appellant's stage was the sole and proximate cause of the injury to respondent. No good cause appears to set aside the verdict in so far as it fixes upon appellant liability for the accident. This court can reverse the judgment and remand the cause to the lower court for a new trial solely upon the issue of the amount of damages. Morris v. Standard Oil Co., 188 Cal. 468, 205 P. 1073; Livesey v. Stock (Cal. Sup.) 281 P. 70; Davis v. Renton (Cal. App.) 278 P. 442.

The judgment is therefore reversed, and the cause is remanded for a new trial solely upon the issue of the amount of damages, with directions to the trial court to render judgment in favor of the respondent for the amount of damages so found upon a determination of that issue.

MITCHELL v. DUNN et al.
L. A. 11875.Supreme Court of California.
Dec. 15, 1930.1. Trusts ⇨102(2).

Evidence showed realty was purchased by incompetent's guardian with trust funds, not personal funds, warranting imposition of trust.

2. Evidence ⇨589.

In action to impress trust on property allegedly purchased with trust funds, court is not bound by trustee's testimony, when circumstances create suspicion.

3. Trusts ⇨372(1).

When trustee has partially dissipated trust fund, and later deposits personal funds, strong presumption arises trustee intended to restore trust fund.

4. Trusts ⇨372(1).

Presumption that trustee's withdrawals from commingled personal and trust funds are personal moneys held inapplicable to defeat cestui's recovery.

Presumption in question is based on theory that trustee acts honestly and not dishonestly, and is nothing more than a fiction created to assist cestui, not to injure him.

5. Trusts ⇨354.

Cestui cannot follow trust funds, unless tracing them into specific property; trustee's possession of trust funds and purchase of property being insufficient.

6. Trusts ⇨352.

In tracing trust funds into specific property, necessary degree of identification is less, as between cestui and trustee, than it is between insolvent trustee and creditors.

7. Trusts ⇨352.

When trustor's money can be traced into particular fund or deposit, although mingled with other money, beneficiary may enforce trust.

8. Trusts ⇨354.

Incompetent ward held entitled to impress trust on specific realty purchased by guardian with money from fund containing personal and trust moneys; remaining moneys being subsequently dissipated.

Action by Arthur Anderson Mitchell, an incompetent, by Iva J. Angier, his guardian, against Ethel Williams Dunn and husband. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal.

WASTE, C. J.

This action was brought by the present guardian of Arthur Anderson Mitchell, an incompetent, for the purpose of impressing a trust on certain specific real property now in the possession of defendants, on the theory that the same had been purchased by the defendants with funds belonging to the plaintiff during a period of time when the defendant Ethel Williams Dunn was the duly appointed and acting guardian of the incompetent plaintiff.

The facts leading up to the controversy are as follows: Defendant Ethel Williams Dunn is a sister of the incompetent, who, while in the service of the United States during the World War, was charged, together with other negro soldiers, with a criminal assault. He was adjudged insane, and was sent to an asylum in Chester, Ill. Later, through the efforts of the defendant sister, he was transferred to an asylum in Southern California. On October 2, 1919, defendant was appointed guardian of the estate and person of her brother, and acted as such until October 14, 1927.

During the period that defendant acted as guardian, considerable money came into her possession belonging to the incompetent, such sums being derived from war risk insurance and government compensation. During a considerable portion of this time defendant had two accounts with the Citizens' National Bank of Los Angeles, one a personal account and one a guardianship account. It appears, however, that she made no attempt to keep her personal and trust funds separate. On November 3, 1924, she purchased the real property which is the subject of this litigation, paying therefor, it is admitted, with a $3,900 check drawn on the guardianship account. The property was recorded by defendant in her own name, and immediately homesteaded. This property will be referred to as the Jefferson street property. Plaintiff contends that the $3,900 was trust money; defendant contends it was her personal money. In order to fully understand the contentions of the parties, the origin of the money in the guardianship account must be traced.

From the time of her appointment as guardian, in 1919, until December, 1924, defendant had rendered no accounting of her trust.' On December 10, 1924, her first account was approved by the court; it being found as of that date that defendant was in possession of $5,452.98 belonging to the estate of plaintiff. Most of this money had come into her possession before November 3, 1924, the date on which the Jefferson street property was purchased, so that it can be safely said that on that date defendant should have had in her possession over $5,000 of trust funds. The two bank accounts, introduced in evidence, disclose that early in June, 1924, only $2 was on deposit in the guardianship account and slightly over $500 in the personal account of defendant, sums far less than the amount then supposedly in her possession belonging to plaintiff. No evidence was introduced by either party in reference to what had happened to the trust funds, but the inference is clear that the trust funds had been dissipated by defendant. On August 8, 1924, defendant deposited in the guardianship account the sum of $9,200, making a balance as of that date of $9,302 in that account. The origin of this $9,200 was traced by defendant as follows: In 1920 defendant had purchased a piece of real property in her own name, which will hereafter be referred to as the Kohler street property. Defendant testified, and no reason appears for doubting the fact, that the down payment on this property was made from her own funds, being $1,415 she had received as an allotment from the government on behalf of her husband, a soldier with the United States Army in France. For a period of years defendant made payments on this Kohler street property. Whether trust funds were used for this purpose is not clear, defendant testifying that the payments were made from her earnings and from rents received from the Kohler street property, an apartment house. Plaintiff offered no evidence on this point. In June, 1924, defendant sold the Kohler street property for cash, receiving $9,267 net on the deal. This money she first deposited in her personal account, and, on August 8, 1924, withdrew the same from that account and deposited $9,200 in the guardianship account and purchased the Jefferson street property, which is involved in this suit. As set forth supra, on December 10, 1924, defendant should have had $5,452.98 belonging to the estate of plaintiff. On that date there was exactly $5,452.98 on deposit in the guardianship account.

Defendant continued to act as guardian until October of 1927, and during that period evidently dissipated the entire remainder of the fund. On October 14, 1927, upon petition of the regional attorney of the United States Veterans' Bureau, defendant was removed as guardian for mismanagement of the estate and Iva J. Angier was substituted in her place. On the final accounting, the court found that defendant should have in her possession $4,742.17 belonging to the estate of her brother. No part of this sum has ever been turned over to the present guardian. Upon this state of facts, defendant contends that the Jefferson street property was purchased with personal funds, while plaintiff, with equal vigor, contends that the property was purchased with trust funds. The trial court found that the $3,967, the exact amount paid for the Jefferson street property, was trust money, and not the personal money of defendant, and decreed that the plaintiff was the equitable owner of the Jefferson street property; that defendant holds the legal title in trust for plaintiff; that the homestead declared thereon was null and void; and that defendant should deed the property to plaintiff.

On this appeal defendant-appellant contends that the evidence above summarized clearly shows that the entire $9,200 deposited in the trust account was money belonging to her separate estate, and that therefore the $3,900 drawn therefrom for the purchase of the Jefferson street property was from her separate estate, and not from the trust estate. Appellant also contends that, even if the $9,200 be treated as composed of both separate and trust funds, the particular $3,900 must be considered as separate money, for the reason that, after withdrawing the same, there still remained in the guardianship account an amount equal to the sum held in trust. In this connection, appellant strongly relies on the presumption that, where a trustee commingles trust and personal funds, and then withdraws part of the fund, it will be presumed that the withdrawals were from the personal funds of the trustee, and that the balance constitutes the trust funds, citing such cases as Elizalde v. Elizalde, 137 Cal. 634, 641, 66 P. 369, 70 P. 861, and People v. California Safe Deposit, etc., Co., 175 Cal. 756, 760, 167 P. 388, L. R. A. 1918A, 1151.

[1-3] The contention of appellant that the evidence shows that she bought the Jefferson street property with her separate funds is entirely without merit. It appears that before the $9,200 was deposited in the trust account the appellant had entirely dissipated the trust estate. When she withdrew the money from her personal account and deposited it in the guardianship account, she undoubtedly did so with the intent of replacing the trust funds that she had dissipated. It is true that appellant testified that the transfer was made to prevent her then husband from making claim thereon, but in such cases the trial court is not bound by the testimony of the trustee when the circumstances are such as to cast suspicion thereon. After making the deposit above mentioned, appellant clearly treated the guardianship account as composed of trust funds. In the accounting of December 10, 1924, the court allowed $200 attorney's fees and an $800 fee to the guardian. On December 10, 1924, $200 was withdrawn from the guardianship account, and on December 11, $800 was withdrawn, undoubtedly to pay the above two items. This clearly shows an intent on the part of appellant to treat the funds deposited by her from her personal account as replacements of the trust funds, and is entirely incompatible with the idea that at all times she intended to treat the fund so transferred as belonging to her personal estate. Moreover, when a trust fund has been partially dissipated by the trustee, and later the trustee deposits in the depleted account personal funds, there is a strong presumption that it was the trustee's intention in making such deposits to make the trust fund whole. Garst v. Canfield, 44 R. I. 220, 116 A. 482.

From the above reasoning it follows that the guardianship account, containing, as it did, over $9,300, must be deemed to have been composed of about $5,400 trust moneys and about $3,900 personal moneys, when, on November 3, 1924, $3,900 was withdrawn therefrom to purchase the property in dispute. The only question left to determine was whether the sum withdrawn was from the trust funds or from the personal funds of appellant. If the presumption that withdrawals must be deemed to have been from the personal part of the commingled fund applies to such a case, it is clear that no trust can be enforced against the Jefferson street property.

[4] We are of the opinion that the presumption mentioned has no application to a case such as this: The presumption is nothing more than a fiction created to assist the cestui, not to injure him. It was created to assist cestuis in following the trust property, not to hinder them. The basis of the presumption is that it will be presumed that a trustee acts honestly, and not dishonestly. In People v. California Safe Deposit, etc., Co., supra, at page 760, of 175 Cal., 167 P. 388, 389, the presumption is explained as follows: "The argument is based upon the well-settled rule that, if a trustee mingles his own funds with the trust fund, and thereafter draws from time to time from the commingled mass, 'it will be presumed that the moneys so drawn were from his own portion of the fund, rather than from the moneys held by him in trust.' [Citing several cases.] Various expressions have been used in defining the nature of the rule. In some of the cases, as pointed out by the appellant, it has been said that equity will 'attribute' the withdrawals to the trustee's private account. In others, as in the Elizalde Case, above cited, it is said that the trustee will be 'presumed' to have drawn his own money. In one case (Crawford County Commissioners v. Strawn, 157 Fed. 49, 84 C. C. A. 553, 15 L. R. A. [N. S.] 1100) the doctrine is explained as resting upon a 'fiction.' But, whatever name be given to it, the rule originates in and rests upon the underlying presumption 'that a person is innocent of crime or wrong.'"

[5-7] In the case just quoted from, the trust arose by virtue of the trustee acquiring money of the plaintiff by fraud. The court held the presumption above mentioned had no application to such a case, because the trustee, having acted fraudulently in acquiring the money, cannot thereafter be presumed to have been acting honestly and rightfully. The same reasoning applies to the present case. The appellant herein wrongfully dissipated the trust funds in her possession and then replaced the funds wrongfully taken. Then, after purchasing the real property herein involved, appellant dissipated the entire fund. Can appellant, after having been guilty of such conduct over a period of years, come before the court and contend that, because it must be presumed she acted rightfully on November 3, 1924, the only tangible property purchased from the fund and still remaining in her possession must be presumed to have been purchased with personal funds, and that all the money that was dissipated by her must be presumed to have been trust funds? To state the proposition is to refute it. In fact, if we are to presume the appellant acted rightfully, it would be far more consonant with such a presumption to say that the property purchased was purchased with trust funds, and the money dissipated was personal funds. At any rate, the presumption in reference to withdrawals, in a contest between the cestui and trustee, based, as it is, on a theory of rightdoing, cannot be indulged in to defeat the cestui's right of recovery when all the evidence shows a consistent course of conduct amounting to wrongdoing. To permit the presumption to be used for that purpose would be to permit its use as a shield for wrongdoing, and that we are not inclined to do. The Supreme Court of Tennessee, in American Surety Co. v. Grace, 151 Tenn. 575, 271 S. W. 739, at page 742, after stating the presumption under consideration, had the following to say about its application: "* * * The rule stated is but a fiction of law. It was invented to aid in the pursuit and recovery of a trust fund. * * * It would destroy the whole purpose of this fiction if it were employed to obstruct a beneficiary seeking to follow a trust fund, and to protect an unfaithful trustee. * * *" The reasoning of that case appeals to us as applicable here. We are aware of the rule that a cestui cannot follow trust funds unless he can trace them into the specific property involved. It does not suffice merely to show possession of trust funds by the trustee and the purchase of the property; it is clear that the identity of the funds must be traced. Estate of Arms, 186 Cal. 554, 199 P. 1053; Wood- side v. Hewel, 109 Cal. 481, 42 P. 152. However, the degree of identification in an action between the cestui and the trustee is far less than in a case where the trustee is insolvent and the rights of creditors are involved. Whatever confusion may have existed in this regard in the decisions of this state was entirely set at rest by the case of Noble v. Noble, 198 Cal. 129, 248 P. 439, 43 A. L. R. 1235. That case held that in a contest between the cestui and the administrator of a deceased defaulting trustee, where the trustee had commingled trust and personal funds, the cestui had a special lien on the entire estate of the deceased solvent trustee, even though the trust funds could not be traced into any definite property. The court very carefully distinguished the cases involving the rights of creditors, and held that a different rule applied in such cases. The rule is now settled in this state that, when the money of the trustor can be traced into a particular fund, or deposit, though it be mingled with other money, the beneficiary may enforce the trust. Newport v. Hatton, 195 Cal. 132, 150, 231 P. 987.

[8] In the case at bar, the plaintiff has sufficiently traced the trust funds. The specific piece of property involved was purchased with money taken from a fund containing trust moneys. All other moneys were dissipated. The law will not permit the trustee to say that the only permanent investment made with moneys from the fund was with personal funds, and that the dissipated funds belonged to the cestui. Under such circumstances it must be held that the property was purchased with trust funds, and that defendant holds the title in trust for plaintiff.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

Certiorari to Industrial Accident Commission.

Proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Act by Dora Lee MacDonald, claimant, opposed by the Battle Creek Food Company, employer, and the American Mutual Liability Company, of Boston, Mass., insurer. To review an order of the Industrial Accident Commission dismissing the application for compensation, claimant brings certiorari.

Order affirmed.

Edwin J. Miller, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Edward O. Allen, of San Francisco, and Willis I. Morrison, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

LANGDON, J.

This is a petition by an employee for review of an order of the Industrial Accident Commission dismissing an application for compensation.

Petitioner was employed as a traveling demonstrator of food products by the Battle Creek Food Company. She solicited orders in various cities and towns in California and several other western states. On October 2, 1928, she was in Billings, Mont., and had lunch there at a small cafeteria. On her way out she slipped and fell to the floor, suffering a fracture of the hip. She was taken to a hospital, and remained there under treatments for three months.

A claim for compensation was filed on October 1, 1929, and a hearing was had thereon, in which several issues were presented to the commission. With respect to the question whether the injury arose in the course of her employment, petitioner testified that she intended to make a demonstration and was waiting to interview the manager. The evidence on this point is not entirely satisfactory, and the commission in its findings ignored this and other issues, resting its order on the sole ground that the application was barred by the statute of limitations.

The Workmen's Compensation Act requires that a claim for compensation must be filed within six months from the date of the injury, but makes certain exceptions to this requirement. The one relied upon here reads as follows: "Provided, further, that the provisions of this section shall not apply to an employee who is totally disabled and bedridden as a result of his injury, during the continuance of such condition or until the expiration of six months thereafter." Workmen's Compensation Act, § 11(c), Deering's General Laws, Act 4749, p. 1721. It is petitioner's contention that she was "totally disabled and bedridden" within the meaning of the statute, from the time of her injury up to a period less than six months before filing her application with the commission. Since the application was filed on October 1, 1929, this contention must fall unless it be shown that petitioner was bedridden until about April 1, 1929.

[1-4] Whether a person is in this condition is a question of fact, and the burden is upon the applicant to bring himself within the statutory exception. Rose v. Petaluma & Santa Rosa Railway Co., 64 Cal. App. 213, 221 P. 406. If the employee is able to get up and walk, he is obviously not bedridden, even though his injury causes him considerable pain and a good portion of his time is spent in bed. See Francisco v. Industrial Accident Commission, 192 Cal. 635, 221 P. 373; 27 Cal. Jur. 466, § 137. Construing the provision in the light of its purpose, it would seem that an injured employee is to be considered "totally disabled and bedridden" only if he is in such a condition as to be unable to take steps to file his claim for compensation, bearing in mind that such a claim may be made by correspondence or through an agent.

[5] The major part of the evidence before the commission came from petitioner herself. It appears that she was injured on October 2, 1928, and remained in the hospital at Billings for three months, until January 2, 1929. Upon her discharge from the hospital she came by train to San Francisco. She was as yet unable to walk and was accompanied by a woman who assisted her. She remained in San Francisco until about July 19, 1929, staying at the home of a friend. At about this date she left for Los Angeles, where she resided with her sister. With respect to the period prior to April, 1929, she testified that she was unable to dress or get up out of bed, and that she was "absolutely unable to do a thing." On cross-examination, however, she admitted that during January and February she was able to get up on crutches to go to the bathroom and to the kitchen; that she took a good part of her meals in the kitchen; that she spent much of her time out of bed, with her shoes on, sitting in the kitchen with her friend and members of the family. A copy of petitioner's "Progress Record" in the hospital at Billings was introduced as her own exhibit, and in it we find the following remarks: "Cast Removed—Patient about on crutches and Recovering. * * * Discharged on Dec. 31 - 1928 Condition Excellent."

The record contains various contradictory statements by petitioner, but irrespective of the effect of these as tending to discredit her as a witness, the evidence which she herself gave is sufficient to sustain the conclusion of the commission that she was not "totally disabled and bedridden" within the meaning of the statute. Despite her serious condition, it can hardly be said that she was physically or mentally unable to make her claim, the necessity of which she was fully aware shortly after the injury occurred. We have no alternative but to conclude with the commission that the claim was barred.

The order dismissing the application is therefore affirmed.

Proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Act by Willella Gale and others, as widow and minor children of Kenneth W. Gale, deceased, opposed by Mark M. A decision of the Industrial Accident Commission denying an award was affirmed by the Court of Appeals by denial of writ of review, and petitioners apply for hearing to Supreme Court.

RICHARDS, J.

The petitioners, who are the widow and minor children of Kenneth W. Gale, deceased, applied to the Industrial Accident Commission for an award against Mark M. Campbell, Richfield Oil Company, Kinner Airplane & Motor Corporation, and Maryland Casualty Company, a corporation, alleging that Kenneth W. Gale, an airplane pilot, had been killed in an airplane accident at Mines Field, Los Angeles, on September 5, 1929, while engaged in flying an airplane under employment by the respondents in said application. Hearings were had thereon, at the conclusion of which the commission made its findings and decision denying said application upon the ground that the evidence did not establish that Kenneth W. Gale was the employee of the respondents Richfield Oil Company, Mark M. Campbell, or Kinner Airplane & Motor Corporation, and that the proceeding was not, therefore, within the jurisdiction of the commission. A petition for rehearing was presented and denied; whereupon the petitioners applied for a writ of review to the District Court of Appeal in and for the Second Appellate District, Division Two, which application was therein denied without an opinion; whereupon the petitioners applied for a hearing before this court, which was granted, and the matter has, upon the record presented before the Industrial Accident Commission, been submitted for decision.

[1] We adopt the statement of the evidence summarized by the petitioners, from which it appears that the facts of the case are substantially as follows: Kenneth W. Gale, an airplane pilot, was killed in an airplane accident at Mines Field, Los Angeles, upon the date above stated, leaving as his dependents the petitioners herein. The respondent Mark M. Campbell was a designer and builder of airplanes, and in the summer of 1929 had constructed an airplane which he believed capable of establishing new aeronautic records, and, being in the need of financial assistance to attempt flights which might produce such records, he went to the Richfield Oil Company for aid. He there interviewed Mr. Dudley Steel, an official of that company, setting forth what he claimed to be the merits of his airplane, stating that he needed money to pay pilot's wages and other expenses. He was then informed by Steel that, if the airplane and pilot met with his approval, the Richfield Oil Company would give Campbell the assistance required. A written agreement was entered into between the Richfield Oil Company and Campbell, wherein the latter agreed that he would use the products of the Richfield Oil Company, delivery of which he accepted, for the purpose of making an attempt to break the existing altitude record in a Campbell supersport monoplane, and for such other test flights prior to said attempt as might be deemed necessary. He further agreed that in consideration of the delivery to him of such products he would allow said company the privilege of using his name or testimony for advertising in whatever manner the said company might see fit to employ, and that he would use no other fuel or lubricant than those of the Richfield Oil Company in connection with any record breaking flight he might attempt within the period of six months from the date of said agreement. Nothing was said therein as to the employment or payment of any pilot by or on behalf of the Richfield Oil Company. Upon executing this agreement, Campbell was introduced to one Petrie, who was an assistant to Steel, and, because of the fact that Steel was about to leave for the East, the matter was turned over to Petrie, with the understanding that the airplane and the pilot employed to fly it must meet with the approval of the Richfield Oil Company. Objection was made to a certain pilot whom Campbell contemplated employing; whereupon the latter sought for another pilot and was introduced to Kenneth W. Gale on or about August 17, 1929, at which time and after ascertaining his qualifications Campbell told Gale that he was to be employed to fly the airplane, and, when Gale inquired about his pay, Campbell told him that he (Gale) would have to look to the Richfield Oil Company for his pay. The matter of possible wages was discussed, and Gale was informed that he must make his arrangements with the Richfield Oil Company as to the amount of wages to be paid. Gale thereupon left Campbell for the avowed purpose of speaking to Petrie about his compensation, and later returned to Campbell and told him that he had made a contract with the Richfield Oil Company. Thereafter the airplane was hauled to Mines Field by the Richfield Oil Company and the name "Richfield Oil Company" was painted on both sides of the airplane in large letters. Several test flights were made, some of which were viewed by Mr. Petrie, who told Campbell that the pilot and the airplane were all right, or words to that effect. Thereafter two attempts were made to break the altitude record, the results of which do not appear to have been shown. An attempt was then made by Gale to break a speed record, and a course was laid out therefor under the supervision of Petrie. It was while attempting this flight that the accident occurred which resulted in the wreck of the airplane and the death of Kenneth W. Gale, the pilot.

Upon the hearing before the commission, certain witnesses testified that Gale had told them that he was to be paid pilot's wages by the Richfield Oil Company for every hour that he spent in the airplane, and, in addition to such wages, he was to receive prize money or a bonus if he established new records. Other witnesses, among them the respondent Campbell, testified that they were present and heard Petrie promise to get Gale $100 expense money pending the return of the Richfield official (presumably Steel) from the East; but the record shows that Gale was killed before the date upon which Petrie was to procure and pay said sum. Upon the hearing before the commission, both Steel and Petrie appeared as witnesses for the respondent Richfield Oil Company and categorically and positively denied that Gale had ever been employed by the Richfield Oil Company, or that any contract or understanding had ever been entered into with him consummating such employment. It was admitted, however, by Steel that he had told Campbell that the Richfield Oil Company might pay a bonus to the pilot if a record were established. The foregoing is a fair summary of the evidence educated at the hearing before the commission and upon which it based its findings and decision denying the petitioners an award. It is not seriously contended by the petitioners that they are entitled to an award either against Campbell or any other of the respondents herein than the Richfield Oil Company.

[2] It must be conceded that the preponderance of the evidence before the commission would seem to be in favor of upholding the petitioners' contention, and it must also be conceded that to the weight of such evidence there is to be added the statutory presumption of employment created by section 8(b) of the Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1917, p. 835), which reads as follows: "Any person rendering service for another, other than as an independent contractor, or as expressly excluded herein, is presumed to be an employee within the meaning of this act." It must also be conceded that the effect of this presumption, taken in connection with the evidence offered on behalf of the petitioners herein, would be that of casting upon the respondents in said proceeding the burden of affirmatively overcoming the said presumption. But, when this much is conceded, it must further be admitted that the commission was, under the terms of the Constitution and of the Workmen's Compensation Act, invested with the full and exclusive jurisdiction of determining whether or not, in the presence of conflicting evidence in any proceeding before it, this presumption had been overcome, and whether or not, in the presence of such conflicting evidence, it had been sufficiently established that the relation of employer and employee existed between the deceased and the respondents at the time of the occurrence of the casualty which resulted in the former's death. We are constrained to hold that the positive denial on the part of the officials of the Richfield Oil Company to the effect that no understanding or agreement for the employment of Gale had ever been entered into by or on behalf of the Richfield Oil Company created such a material conflict in the evidence relating to his said employment as would have sufficed to justify the findings and decision of the commission to the effect that no such employment existed, and to have therefore compelled the conclusion that this court has no authority to overthrow the findings and decision of the commission in that regard.

The order of the commission denying the petitioners relief in this proceeding is affirmed.

NARVER v. CALIFORNIA STATE LIFE INS. CO.*L. A. 11806.

Supreme Court of California.

Dec. 29, 1930.

1. Insurance ⇨146(3).

Ambiguous provisions in life policy, capable of two constructions, should be construed most favorably to insured.

2. Insurance ⇨146(3).

Insurer cannot defeat ambiguous policy by construction, if reasonable construction upholding insurance can be had without doing violence to language used and parties' clear intention.

3. Insurance ⇨150.

Indorsement or rider on life policy, relating to short-term premium until beginning of first policy year, held not policy separate from main policy.

Indorsement provided, in substance, that in consideration of payment in advance of a short-term premium, insurer agrees to pay amount insured if death of insured shall occur before February 28, 1928, which is beginning of first policy year.

4. Insurance ⇨150.

Indorsements on insurance policy form part of insurance contract, and policy with indorsements and riders thereon must be construed together.

5. Insurance ⇨186(5).

Insured's note, given and accepted as payment of premiums under life policy, held to constitute "payment."

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Payment," see Words and Phrases.]

6. Insurance ⇨445(3).

Under ambiguous terms of life policy, application, premium receipt, and indorsement considered as whole, policy held effective on November 28, 1927, warranting recovery where insured committed suicide more than year thereafter.

Suicide clause in life policy provided that in case of suicide committed while sane or insane, within one year from effective date, recovery should be limited to total amount of premium paid. Various recitals in policy showed effective date to be February 28, 1928; that policy and application therefore should constitute entire contract between parties. Application provided that effective date should be determined by payment of premium with application. Receipt for first premium delivered on October 25, 1927, recited that insurance shall take effect and be in force from day of approval at home office if premium is fully paid with application, or upon manual delivery of policy to applicant during lifetime, and good health and full payment of premium thereon if premium has not been paid with application. Short-term indorsement in consideration of additional premium made policy effective from November 28 to February 28, 1928, following, and recited that latter date should be beginning of first policy year. Policy was issued on November 28, 1927, and delivered on or about December 1st. Insured committed suicide on December 10, 1928.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; Frank Lamberson, Judge.

Action by Emma S. Narver against the California State Life Insurance Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

For opinion of District Court of Appeal herewith adopted, see 287 P. 107.

C. E. McLaughlin, C. P. McLaughlin, and McLaughlin & McLaughlin, all of Sacramento, for appellant.

Eugene U. Blalock, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

After further consideration of the opinion in this case, written by Justice Marks of the Fourth Appellate District and concurred in by Justice Barnard and Justice Pro Tem. Owen, we are of the opinion that it correctly disposes of the questions of law presented by the facts of said case, and we approve and adopt the same as the opinion of this court.

Said opinion is as follows:

Respondent is the widow of Chester Narver and the beneficiary named in an insurance policy issued by appellant on his life.

On October 28, 1927, the deceased made his application to appellant for a policy of insurance upon his life in the sum of $5,000, and on the same day executed his promissory note to appellant in the sum of $176.95 in payment of the premiums to accrue under said policy until February 28, 1929. The promissory note was subsequently paid. The deceased took his medical examination and the policy was issued by appellant on the 28th day of November, 1927, and delivered to deceased on or about December 1st of the same year.

The insurance policy contained the following paragraph: "This policy is incontestable after one year if all premiums shall have been duly paid, except as to provisions and conditions relating to any double indemnity or total and permanent disability benefits which may be issued in connection herewith. In case of suicide of the insured, committed while sane or insane, within one year from the date hereof, the limit of recovery hereunder shall be the total amount of the premium paid."

Above the signature of the president and secretary of the insurance company on the policy appears the following: "In witness whereof, California State Life Insurance Company has caused this policy to be signed by its President and its Secretary of Sacramento, California, this twenty-eighth day of February, 1928. Which is the date of this policy."

The policy further provided that: "This policy and the application therefor (a copy of which application is attached hereto when issued) constitute the entire contract between the parties hereto."

Attached to and made a part of the policy under this clause was the application for insurance, in which the following appears: "I further agree that the effective date of any policy which may be issued hereon shall be determined as follows: (a) If the premium be fully paid with this application, such policy shall take effect at twelve o'clock noon of the day upon which this application is approved by the company at the home office."

In the report of the medical examiner, a copy of which was attached to the policy, there appears the following: "I have verified each of the foregoing answers on this page and on the first page hereof and adopt them as my own, and warrant that they are full, complete and literally true answers to the questions against which they are written. I further agree that if during the first year following the date of any policy issued hereon I commit suicide, whether sane or insane, the only liability under any policy issued thereon shall be for a fixed sum equal to the actual cash premium paid to the company on said policy."

On October 25, 1927, there was delivered to the insured a receipt, the material parts of which were as follows:

October 25, 1927.

"Received of Chester Narver One Hundred Seventy-Six and 95/100 Dollars in full for fifteen months the first annual premium on Five Thousand dollars insurance. Counter-signed by Harvey Stewart. Agent."

"The insurance shall take effect and be in force: (a) At twelve o'clock noon of the date of approval at the home office of the Company, if the premium be fully paid with the application; (b) Upon manual delivery of the policy to the applicant during his lifetime and good health and full payment of the premium thereon, if such premium has not been paid with the application."

"California State Life Insurance Company. J. R. Kruse, President. Do not detach this receipt except for delivery to applicant for full settlement of premium. This is the only form of receipt authorized by the company to be given to an applicant for a premium collected when the application is taken. California State Life Insurance Company. Sacramento, California."

Attached to the policy of insurance as an indorsement or rider was the following:

"November 28, 1927.

"In consideration of the payment in advance of a Short Term Premium of Twelve and 60/100 Dollars, California State Life Insurance Company agrees, subject to the provisions of this policy and the application therefor, to pay the amount insured hereunder if the death of the insured shall occur prior to February 28, 1928, which is the beginning of the first policy year. Double indemnity and Total Disability Benefits, if either thereof be stipulated in this policy, are not included herein, and neither shall be effective until noon of the date herein stated, and then only if the premium for the first policy be fully paid.

"[Signed] Arthur Luddy, Asst. Secretary."

Insured committed suicide on December 10, 1928. Proofs of his death were made and delivered to appellant, and demand was made upon it by respondent for the sum of $5,000, which payment was refused. On January 3, 1929, appellant tendered to respondent the sum of $164.35, which was the amount of the premium on the policy of insurance for the year commencing February 28, 1928.

Respondent brought this action to recover on the policy of insurance, and, after a trial in the court below, without a jury, the court found all facts in her favor and rendered judgment against appellant for the principal sum of $5,000.

Appellant presents two grounds upon which it asks this court to reverse the judgment of the trial court. The first is that, as it maintains there were two policies of insurance issued to deceased, one being a short-term policy commencing on November 28, 1927, and ending on February 28, 1928, the premium for which was $12.60, and the other a twenty-year nonparticipating policy commencing on February 28, 1928, the premium being $164.35, payable annually on the 28th day of each February. The second ground upon which the reversal is asked is a corollary of the first, namely: That since the policy of insurance in effect on December 10, 1928, did not become operative until February 28, 1928, one year had not elapsed at the time of the suicide of the insured, and that, therefore, the principal sum of $5,000 could not be collected, but that only the annual premium paid, $164.35, was recoverable. The exact questions presented upon this appeal do not seem to have been decided in California.

[1, 2] It is a well-recognized rule of law that if any uncertainties or ambiguities appear in an insurance policy which may be solved by either one of two reasonable constructions, the one which is most favorable to the insured and which will give life, force, and effect to the policy should be adopted. The insurance company, having prepared the policy and all documents used in connection with its issuance, should not be heard to put such a construction upon an ambiguity, caused by it, as will defeat the policy and take from the beneficiary the very purpose and object of the insurance, if a reasonable construction upholding the insurance can be had that does no violence to the language used and the clear intention of the parties. Pacific Heating & Ventilating Co. v. Williamsburg, etc., Co., 158 Cal. 367, 111 P. 4; Welch v. British American Assurance Co., 148 Cal. 223, 82 P. 964, 113 Am. St. Rep. 223, 7 Ann. Cas. 396; Witherow v. United American Insurance Co. of Pennsylvania (Cal. App.) 251 P. 668. With this rule in mind, we will proceed to a consideration of the contract of insurance involved in this appeal.

[3, 4] Appellant contends that the indorsement, or rider, on the main policy of insurance, which put in effect the insurance from November 28, 1927, to February 28, 1928, was a policy of insurance complete in itself and a contract separate and distinct from the main policy. With this we cannot agree. Taken by itself, this indorsement means nothing. Of itself, it is not a contract in any sense of the word. By its terms it refers to the main policy and the application therefor, and, except as specifically excepted in the indorsement, it put the provisions of the policy into force and effect. Indorsements on an insurance policy form a part of the insurance contract (25 Cyc. of Law and Procedure, 743), and the policy of insurance with the indorsements and riders thereon must be construed together as a whole. Sharp v. Scottish Union National Ins. Co., 136 Cal. 542, 69 P. 253, 615.

[5, 6] Considering the policy of insurance as a whole, we find a most obvious and patent ambiguity as to its date. The closing paragraph of the main policy gives February 28, 1928, as its date. The application for the insurance, of which there was only one, and which was made a part of the contract of insurance, contains the direct statement that "if the premium be fully paid with this application such policy shall take effect at twelve o'clock noon of the day upon which this application is approved by the Company at its home office." The application was approved and the policy actually issued on November 28, 1927. It was registered with the insurance department of the state of California on November 29, 1927, and delivered to deceased two days later. His note was given and accepted as payment of the premium and was therefore a payment of them. Harrigan v. Home Life Ins. Co., 128 Cal. 531, 58 P. 186, 61 P. 99. The receipt given to the insured by the company contained language identical with that in the application as to when the policy should take effect. From these documents the insured was justified in assuming that his policy of insurance became effective at noon on November 28, 1927. Why the date of February 28, 1928, was used at the close of the policy is not entirely clear. It is not an unreasonable conclusion, in fact it is entirely probable, that it was inserted for the convenience of the parties to fix the due date of the future annual premiums.

We therefore conclude that the policy of insurance was made operative and put in effect by the short-term insurance rider and under all the terms of the policy the date of this instrument became the date of the policy. We are aided in reaching this conclusion by four decisions from other jurisdictions, namely, Krebs v. Philadelphia Life Ins. Co., 249 Pa. 330, 95 A. 91, Ann. Cas. 1917D, 1184; Jefferson Standard Life Ins. Co. v. Wilson (C. C. A.) 260 F. 593; Fox v. New York Life Ins. Co., 211 Ill. App. 406, and American National Insurance Co. v. Thompson (Tex. Civ. App.) 186 S. W. 254. The first two of these cases present facts identical with the one we are considering, and the other two, very similar facts. In the case of Krebs v. Philadelphia Standard Life Ins. Co., supra, the policy of insurance was issued upon application of the insured on July 19, 1913. It was dated on October 1, 1913. An indorsement providing for short-term insurance from August 1 to October 1, 1913, was placed upon the policy when issued. The policy was delivered prior to August 1, 1913, and the insured committed suicide on August 24, 1914. It contained a provision that "self destruction, while sane or insane, within one year from the date hereof, is not a risk assumed by the company under this policy," which, in effect, is similar to the language used in the policy issued by appellant.

The Supreme Court of Pennsylvania was of the opinion that if the date of the policy was to be considered as the date appearing on the main instrument, there would be no liability under its terms, the suicide of the insured having occurred within one year from that date, but that if its date were to be taken as the date of the short-term insurance indorsement, the liability of the company would be fixed. The court held that the short-term insurance indorsement did not constitute an insurance policy in itself, and that therefore, it incorporated in its provisions enough of the terms of the main policy to make it a complete contract of insurance. It having incorporated the provisions of this contract it must be held to have incorporated all of them not expressly excepted, as the company could not be permitted to select, as included, the portions favorable to it and reject the others. The court held that there was but one contract of insurance which was in effect on the date of the short-term insurance indorsement, and that as there was an ambiguity in the policy itself, such ambiguity must be construed against the company and in favor of the insured, and affirmed the judgment of the trial court against the insurer.

In the case before us it would have been a simple matter for the appellant to have used such language in the several documents constituting the contract of insurance, so that there would have been no question of its meaning. The company did not do so, and it cannot complain because the trial court, following the usual rule of construction, resolved such ambiguities against it and in favor of the insured.

SEAWELL, J.

This action was brought to enforce payment on an overdue promissory note in the sum of $2,500 made by defendant to the order of plaintiff. Defendant, while admitting the execution, delivery, and nonpayment of the note, by way of answer and cross-complaint, alleged in defense that no consideration had been given for the note, and that its execution and delivery had been secured through the fraud of plaintiff, the circumstances of which will more completely be set forth later in this opinion. On the issue thus formed the case proceeded to trial before the court sitting without a jury, a jury having been waived. As is usual in such fraud cases, during the course of the trial two diametrically opposed stories were narrated by the opposing parties, only one of which could be true. The trial judge believed the story of defendant, and accordingly made its findings of fact and conclusions of law in her favor. From the judgment entered thereon plaintiff prosecutes this appeal. The main ground of the appeal is that the findings are not supported by the evidence.

[1, 2] It is too well settled to require citation of authority that, if the findings of the trial court are supported by any substantial evidence not inherently improbable, they will Trial court's findings, supported by any substantial evidence not inherently improbable, will not be disturbed on appeal.

Weight of evidence is for trial court, whose findings cannot be disturbed on appeal, unless evidence is wholly lacking as matter of law.

3. Witnesses ⇨392(1).

Abandoned answer and cross-complaint, not stating defense set forth in amended answer, held admissible for impeachment purposes in action on note.

4. Appeal and error ⇨1012(1).

Weight of abandoned answer and cross-complaint, introduced in evidence for im-not be disturbed on appeal. We are of the view that the findings in this case may, by a liberal indulgence of the rule, be held to be supported by the evidence. Much of appellant's arguments go to the weight of the evidence, but that was a matter for the trial court and not an appellate court, and we cannot disturb its findings unless, as a matter of law, the evidence is wholly lacking in that respect. Each party was the chief witness in his or her own behalf, with but slight corroborating evidence of a conclusive character sustaining either.

The story, largely as told by respondent, was that in 1920 she was a widow, deriving her sole income from a valuable apartment house inherited from her former husband. She testified that she possessed little or no business experience. She was acquainted with one B. J. Klarman, president of the Morning Star Mining Company, who, it appears, was closely associated with appellant in various deals. Klarman tried without success to sell some stock in the mine to respondent. In April of 1920 Klarman introduced appellant to respondent, and from that time on appellant was a very frequent visitor. He, almost immediately, tried to sell her some Morning Star stock, but she refused to buy. After ingratiating himself into respondent's good graces, appellant tried in various ways to secure control of respondent's property. On one occasion appellant asked respondent to place all of her valuables in his safe deposit box; on other occasions he wanted her to put her real property in his name; and on still another occasion he importuned respondent to place her automobile in his name, all of which respondent refused to do.

After being unsuccessful in interesting respondent in the Morning Star mine, appellant, as related by respondent, then told her that he was very much interested in the company, and was installing machinery in its mine; that he was in on the ground floor; that he wanted to buy some capital stock in said company, but could not have it issued to him directly at that time; that for various reasons he did not want it known that he was the owner of said stock; and for those reasons he asked respondent to take it in her name for him. This she agreed to do.

On the morning of June 1, 1920, appellant called at respondent's residence and delivered to her his check for $2,500, with which to purchase for him 500 shares of the Morning Star stock. Respondent suggested that appellant should have a receipt for the money, and started to prepare one, but appellant handed her a blank form of note, representing it to be a receipt. Respondent could write without glasses, but could not read. Not having her glasses with her, she signed and delivered the document, believing that it was a receipt. Respondent had never in her life borrowed money, nor had she ever seen or signed a promissory note before. Appellant and respondent then proceeded immediately to the office of the Morning Star Mining Company, where respondent asked for and received appellant's stock, the certificate being made in respondent's name. It appears that the corporation at that time had no treasury stock available for sale, and in all probability the stock purchased was the stock of Klarman. Respondent then placed the stock in her safe deposit box. She frequently offered to return this stock to appellant if he would return her "signature," but appellant kept putting her off from time to time. Appellant then attempted to secure respondent's consent to marriage, but respondent refused all such offers. Finally appellant threatened that, unless respondent married him, he would sue on the note. Finally, in April of 1922, shortly before respondent was married to her present husband, appellant made his first demand for payment. Until then respondent did not know she had signed a note, nor had appellant referred to it as such.

Respondent at all times has held the 500 shares of stock in question for appellant and has been and now is willing to deliver the same to appellant upon return to her of the document which she signed on June 1, 1920.

Based on this testimony, the trial court found that respondent signed the note under the belief that it was a receipt; that there was no consideration for the note; that the agreement was that respondent was to use the $2,500 to buy stock for appellant and hold the same in trust for him; that the consent of said respondent to the execution of the note was secured by fraud in the manner set forth, supra.

[3, 4] Appellant stresses the fact that in the original answer and cross-complaint the defense of fraud based on the idea that the alleged note was a receipt was not set forth, nor did respondent mention this fact on the taking of her deposition. The record shows that this theory was first set forth in the amended answer filed about eleven days before trial. Appellant contends that these facts conclusively prove the receipt theory to be false, and, therefore, the entire story of respondent must fall. In this we cannot agree. The appellant introduced the original pleadings into evidence for impeachment purposes, and this he had a right to do. Williams v. Seiglitz, 186 Cal. 767, 200 P. 635. In that case it was directly held that an abandoned pleading may be used for impeachment purposes by showing prior inconsistent statements. The trial judge admitted such pleadings in evidence for the above purposes, but, after hearing all the evidence and observing the demeanor and character of the witnesses and parties, he credited the story set forth in the amended answer. The question as to the weight to be given to the impeaching testimony was one peculiarly within the province of the trial court, and its determination under the circumstances cannot be disturbed.

[5] Moreover, even if there were any merit in appellant's contention in this regard, which there is not, it would avail him but little. The rule is well settled that, in regard to a finding of fraud, such finding will be sustained if there is evidence supporting one material fraudulent representation, even though the evidence fails as to all others. In Beeman v. Richardson, 185 Cal. 280, 281, 196 P. 774, 775, Mr. Justice Olney stated the rule as follows: "As to the finding of fraudulent representations, it is not necessary to detail all the representations which are alleged and found to have been made, and the evidence concerning each. If the finding is sustained as to one material fraudulent representation, it is enough."

[6, 7] Discarding the receipt theory, the evidence of the other material fraudulent representations sufficient to defeat the action on the note is ample.

This case presents an unusual state of facts. It is not one in which the rules appropriate in ordinary business affairs can be inflexibly applied, as there was seemingly involved in the relations of the parties an affair of the heart, and the relations of the parties, especially it would seem on the part of appellant, indicate a matrimonial expectancy. If the parties had been dealing with each other at arm's length, it may be that the trial court would have looked with less favor upon the defenses interposed by respondent. Evidence was also adduced which tended to give color to the theory that appellant and Mr. Klarman, president of the mining company, were in collusion in a plan to unload stock of the mining company upon the respondent, and the appellant made matrimonial overtures to respondent the better to accomplish a mercenary purpose. The conduct of either party is not easily understood, tested by any of the standards which are ordinarily applied in arriving at the true state of mind of the parties whose action is the subject of investigation.

Appellant bears down strongly upon the inconsistent position in which respondent is placed by her own acts. The signing of the promissory note and the making of a copy thereof by filling in the blank spaces of a copy of a printed form furnished by appellant, which respondent testified she believed to be a receipt for the stock delivered to her by appellant, and the insertion by her of the omitted day of the execution of the note and also the omitted word "days" after "ninety," and the further fact that, while on a visit to an eastern state, she wrote to appellant and asked him if he thought she would be able to sell her Gold Star stock (being the stock in suit) when she returned home, and, if so, she would be very glad, were the most serious inconsistencies which confronted the respondent in presenting her defense. A person will not be heard to repudiate his or her act in executing a written instrument except upon valid and satisfactory grounds. It is urged here that respondent has furnished no satisfactory reason or grounds upon which she can be released from her voluntary act. That a fiduciary relation existed between the parties in the form of an incipient love affair is not denied by the appellant, and it was testified by the respondent that she had confidence in the appellant and accepted much that he said without question. She offered as an explanation of her letter to him that the stock had been given to her to keep for appellant, as had other stock before, and that she unwittingly referred to it as her stock because it was in her possession. On the other hand, the conduct of the appellant in his dealings with respondent is not readily explainable. Respondent had had no business experience with the value of stocks, a field into which she had been bidden to enter by appellant—and the stock in the instant case does not appear to have had any substantial value—while appellant is shown to have had at least a contact with the president of said mining company and a mining stock experience. As to the credibility of the president of the mining company and appellant, it may be said in passing that the reputation of each was made an issue at the trial and weighed by the trial court.

Undoubtedly the evidence would have sustained a judgment for appellant had such a judgment been rendered, but the trial court, who was in close touch with the parties to the action, while we are far removed, saw the justice of the case on the side of respondent. Her explanation as to the promissory note and letter transaction evidently gained the credence of the trial court. No other assignments of error require special treatment.

The judgment is affirmed.

CARLSON et al. v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION et al.*

Civ. 4199.

District Court of Appeal, Third District,
California.

Dec. 12, 1930.

Rehearing Denied Jan. 9, 1931. Hearing Granted by Supreme Court Feb. 9, 1931.1. Master and servant ⇨397.

Industrial Accident Commission has no jurisdiction unless relationship of master and servant exists between interested parties (Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 4749, § 6).

2. Master and servant ⇨361.

In compensation proceeding, relationship between deceased and defendant held to be that of lessee and lessor, not servant and master (Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 4749, § 6).

The formal document creating the relationship reserved to lessor authority to direct and control manner of cultivating orchards and harvesting fruit, and prohibited deceased from incumbering fruit, thus indicating an employment or cropping contract; but these reservations were made because of lessor's membership in marketing association. Although the customary term "demise" was not used, the equivalent terms "lease" and "farm-let" necessarily implied conveyance of property. The tenant held the absolute right of possession of the demised premises, was required to hire farm hands and pay for their services, and agreement was for term of five years.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Lease," see Words and Phrases.]

3. Landlord and tenant ⇨20.

"Lease" is conveyance of lands or tenements for term less than that possessed by owner in consideration of rent or compensation in payment for use of premises.

4. Landlord and tenant ⇨127.

Lessee's actual right of possession is necessary incident to valid lease.

5. Landlord and tenant ⇨5(1).

Existence of relationship of landlord and tenant is primarily fact question to be determined from intent of parties, ascertained from construction of entire instrument creating tenancy.

Fact that instrument is termed lease is not controlling, nor is clause giving owner supervision and control of method of farming. Every essential covenant of the instrument should be considered with the document as a whole to ascertain the intent of the parties.

6. Landlord and tenant ⇨323.

There is clear distinction between lease and "cropping contract."

"Cropping contract" is mere agreement to employ one to cultivate land and produce crop on shares, cropper having neither title nor right of possession and being mere servant or employee.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Cropping Agreement or Contract," see Words and Phrases.]

7. Landlord and tenant ⇨323.

Even though landlord reserves all title to crops as security for payment of rent, terms of agreement may still characterize it as lease where tenant is given absolute possession.

Certiorari to Industrial Accident Commission.

Application by Addie Carlson and the Columbia Casualty Company for certiorari to review an order of the Industrial Accident Commission awarding compensation to Belle Cecelia Rodgers and Belle Agnes Rodgers for the death of Manuel Rodgers.

Award annulled.

Redman, Alexander & Bacon and R. P. Wisecarver, all of San Francisco, for petitioners.

E. O. Allen and G. C. Faulkner, both of San Francisco, and Orin J. Lowell, of Auburn, for respondents.

R. L. THOMPSON, J.

This is a writ of certiorari to review an award of damages in the sum of $5,150 by the Industrial Accident Commission on account of the death of Manuel Rodgers.

February 13, 1930, Manuel Rodgers was engaged in blasting out trees with dynamite on the farm owned by the petitioner Addie Carlson at Newcastle. Rodgers was killed as a result of a premature explosion. He left surviving him a wife and daughter. Both were wholly dependent upon him. The commission found that he died from injuries sustained in the course of his employment as foreman of the ranch. An award of $5,150 damages was found against both Addie Carlson and her surety, the Columbia Casualty Company.

The petitioners claim that the deceased was engaged as the lessee of Addie Carlson at the time of the accident. The sole question which is involved in this proceeding is whether the deceased was occupied as an employee or as a lessee of Addie Carlson at the time he sustained the injuries from which he died.

*Hearing granted 2 P.(2d) 151.

[1] The Industrial Accident Commission has no jurisdiction to adjust compensation for accidents or death except when the relationship of master and servant or employer and employee exists between the interested parties. Section 6, Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act, St. 1917, p. 831, and amendments, Deering's Gen. Laws of 1923, p. 1714, Act 4749; 27 Cal. Jur. 275, § 18.

[2] The relationship of the parties, upon which liability in the present matter depends, must be determined by a construction of the document which was executed by them regarding the operation of the fruit ranch belonging to the petitioner Addie Carlson. This indenture was executed October 1, 1929. It purports to be a five-year lease of the farm to Manuel Rodgers in consideration of an equal division of the net proceeds of the sales of the products of the farm. Mrs. Carlson owned a forty-acre fruit ranch near Newcastle. She lived in San Francisco. She was a member of a fruit marketing association and was under contract to deliver to this association all the fruit from this ranch in standard condition suitable for shipment to Eastern markets. She therefore reserved, by the terms of this lease, the right to supervise the cultivation and picking of the crops, and required the fruit to be delivered to this marketing association for sale. One-half of the net proceeds of the sales was retained by Mrs. Carlson in lieu of rent for the premises.

This indenture contained the following provisions:

"This agreement made * * * this first day of October, 1929, by and between Mrs. Addie Carlson, the party of the first part, and Manuel Rodgers, the party of the second part * * *

"Witneseth: That in consideration of the covenants and agreements herein contained, to be kept and performed by the party of the second part, the said Mrs. Addie Carlson does hereby lease and farm-let unto the said Manuel Rodgers, for a term of five (5) years * * * [here follows the description of the ranch in question].

"The terms of this lease are such that the party of the second part is to perform at his own cost and expense, all of the labor and work necessary for the successful carrying on of the premises leased hereby such as plowing, cultivating; * * * that all work of every description shall be done under the supervision of the party of the first part, her agent or representative, and in strict accordance with her wishes, ideas, and instructions, and the different lines of work must be carried out in their proper time and season, as directed by the party of the first part.

"The party of the second part agrees that he will occupy and work the premises leased herewith, and that he will not let in whole or in part, the premises leased hereby, without first getting the written consent of the party of the first part. * * *

"The party of the second part agrees that he will furnish and employ a sufficient number of * * * farm-hands to do in proper time and season all of the work required on the premises; that he will keep in good repair all of the ditches and fences, and will not commit waste or suffer waste to be committed. * * *

"The party of the second part is prohibited from borrowing any money, or placing a lien against the fruit growing, or to be grown on the said premises. * * *

"All of the fruits produced upon the premises leased hereby during the life of this lease must be picked and packed in fit condition for eastern shipment, and according to the standardization rules and delivered to the Newcastle Fruit Growers' Association at its shipping house in Newcastle for the account of and in the name of the party of the first part. * * *

"The party of the second part agrees to carry and pay for at his own sole cost and expense, accident and liability insurance. * * *

"* * * Should the party of the second part fail to comply with any of the terms of this lease * * * the party of the first part may then at her option terminate this lease, and the party of the second part agrees he will then quietly give up possession. * * * In case of sale, the party of the first part reserves the right to cancel this lease. * * *

"The party of the first part is to have the right of ingress and egress, * * * to any and all of the orchard and buildings. * * *

"Now, therefore, in consideration of the covenants and agreements herein contained, the contracting parties hereto, do hereby agree that the net proceeds from the sale of all fruits from the premises leased hereby, shall be equally divided between the party of the first part and the party of the second part, after first deducting the expense * * * [of materials, boxing and shipping the fruit], the party of the first part hereby agreeing to account for and pay to the party of the second part his proportion of the net proceeds. * * *

"Nothing herein contained shall constitute the parties hereto partners. * * *

We are cited to no authority where a document so formal, respecting all the necessary elements of a lease, has been held to constitute merely an agreement of employment or a cropping contract. Such a construction would seem to violate the evident intention of the contracting parties.

[3, 4] We are constrained to hold that the foregoing indenture is a lease and not a mere agreement of employment. It contains all the essential elements of a lease. A lease is a conveyance of lands or tenements for a term less than that which is possessed by the owner, in consideration of rent or compensation in payment for the use of the premises. The actual right of possession of the premises on the part of the lessee is a necessary incident to a valid lease. 2 Bouv. Law Dict. p. 1887; 16 R. C. L. 530, § 2; 1 Tiffany on Landlord & Tenant, p. 159, § 16; 1 Tiffany on Real Property (2d Ed.) p. 124, § 49.

[5] The existence of the relationship of landlord and tenant is primarily a question of fact to be determined from the intent of the contracting parties to be ascertained from a construction of the entire instrument creating the tenancy. Walls v. Preston, 25 Cal. 59, 63; 1 Tiffany on Landlord & Tenant, 160, § 18. The fact that the instrument is termed a lease does not necessarily determine the nature of the instrument. Stockton S. & L. Soc. v. Purvis, 112 Cal. 236, 44 P. 561, 53 Am. St. Rep. 210. Nor does a clause which gives the owner supervision and control of the method of farming necessarily characterize the instrument as an agreement of employment or as a cropping contract. Every essential covenant of the instrument should be considered with the document as a whole to ascertain the intent of the parties.

[6] There is a clear distinction between a lease and a cropping contract. The latter is a mere agreement to employ one to cultivate the land and produce a crop on shares. The cropper has neither title nor right of possession of the land. Neither has he any title to the crop until the division is made. He is a mere servant or employee. On the contrary, an agreement with one to cultivate the land and produce a crop, even though the owner retains absolute title to the crop, may create a relationship of landlord and tenant. This relationship must be determined by ascertaining the intent of the parties. When the agreement is in writing the intent of the parties must be determined by construing the instrument as a whole. 1 Underhill on Landlord & Tenant, 308, § 219. On page 309 of the authority last cited, it is said: "It is sometimes difficult to determine whether a person who cultivates the land of another on shares is a tenant. * * * Much depends upon the wording of the contract between the parties. Each case must be decided upon the special terms of the agreement. * * * If there is an indication that the parties intend that the occupant shall have a right to the possession of the farm and full power of controlling and using it for farming purposes as though it were his own, the contract is a lease. * * * The circumstance that the lease contained the terms 'lease, demise and let,' is a strong fact to show that the instrument is a lease. * * * The parties may expressly provide that the title to the crop shall remain in either of them until division."

In the present case the reservation of the authority to direct and control the manner of cultivating the orchards and harvesting the fruit by the owner; the covenant prohibiting the deceased from encumbering the fruit; the fact that all fruit was to be delivered to the marketing association for sale, for the credit of Mrs. Carlson, and that she was to pay the deceased one-half of the net proceeds of sales as his share of the profits, are circumstances which tend to indicate an employment or a cropping contract. 1 Tiffany on Real Property, 122, § 48. However, we believe these provisions are accounted for from the fact that Mrs. Carlson was under a membership contract to deliver the fruit from that ranch to the marketing association for sale, and that this fruit had to be delivered in standard marketing condition for eastern shipment. These provisions were inserted in the lease to prevent a breach of her membership contract with the Newcastle Fruit Growers' Association.

On the contrary, this indenture contains many provisions which indicate that it was intended as a lease and not as a mere agreement of employment. The instrument was repeatedly designated as a lease. The term "employment" is not used. A specific conveyance of the premises upon which the fruit was produced was made to the deceased. The document provides that "Mrs. Addie Carlson does hereby lease and farm-let [the ranch] unto the said Manuel Rodgers." While it is true the customary term "demise" which is found in most leases is omitted from the indenture, the equivalent terms "lease" and "farm-let" are used. These terms necessarily imply a conveyance of the property. McAlesster v. Landers, 70 Cal. 79, 11 P. 505; 16 R. C. L. 530, §§ 2, 3; Words and Phrases, First Series, vol. 5, p. 4043; 2 Bouv. Law Dict. p. 1887. A definite tenure of five years is provided for. The lessee is given the exclusive occupancy of the premises, except that the owner reserves the usual license of ingress to make repairs and supervise the cultivation of the orchard. The lease provides that "the party of the second part agrees that he will occupy and work the premises leased herewith." The deceased and his family actually did take and retain possession of the demised premises. By the terms of this instrument he was assured peaceable and quiet possession. The very leasing and delivery of possession of the premises implies the right to quiet enjoyment of the property even though the specific covenant to that effect is omitted. 1 Tiffany on Landlord & Tenant, p. 517, § 79; 1 Tiffany on Real Property, p. 125, § 49b. The reservation by the owner of the right of ingress for particular purposes implies that she intended to part with the general right of possession.

Moreover, the lease provides that in the event of a breach of the covenants of the instrument, the party of the first part, at her option, may terminate the lease, and "the party of the second part agrees he will then quietly give up possession." The party of the second part is required "to perform at his own cost and expense, all of the labor and work necessary for the successful carrying on of the [farming of the] premises leased." He agreed to "employ a sufficient number of good and skillful farmhands to do in proper time and season all of the work required on the premises," at his own cost and expense. The covenant requiring Rodgers to hire the farm hands and the obligation of paying for their services are evidence of a tenancy rather than a mere agreement of employment. 1 Underhill on Landlord & Tenant, 302, § 213. The lessee agreed to replant at least 200 fruit trees each year. He also covenanted to keep in good repair all the ditches and fences and "not commit waste or suffer waste to be committed." He was to perform his work in a farmer-like manner. He was furnished by the owner three horses and farming implements which he agreed "to return to the party of the first part, at the expiration of this lease, in as good condition as when received * * * natural wear and tear excepted." And finally, he agreed that he "will not [sub]let in whole or in part, the premises leased hereby, without first getting the written consent of the party of the first part."

We are unable to reconcile the foregoing provisions of the instrument in question upon any theory other than that of a lease. All of the usual terms of a lease are present. The tenant held the absolute right of possession of the demised premises. Even though it be assumed Mrs. Carlson reserved the title to the fruit for the purposes of delivery and sale, Rodgers certainly had an equitable interest therein. His leasehold title to the demised premises cannot be disputed. Except for a breach of the covenants of this lease he could not be lawfully disturbed in his absolute right of possession. Upon the contrary, his title would enable him to successfully maintain an action of ejectment against any one who sought to trespass upon the premises, except the owner or her agent while they were engaged in supervising the cultivation and harvesting of the fruit pursuant to the terms of the agreement. In effect the premises were demised to the deceased for five years in consideration of one-half of the net proceeds of the sales of the fruit produced thereon. Rodgers was sole tenant of the farm.

The absolute right of possession of the ranch on the part of Rodgers and the agreement for the long term of five years instead of a single season are circumstances strongly indicating the existence of a lease instead of an agreement of employment or cropping contract. 1 Tiffany on Real Property, 121, § 48. In 16 Ruling Case Law, 587, § 62, it is said: "The most important criterion in arriving at the intention of the parties and the consequential relation created is which party was entitled to the possession of the land; if it was the intention that the landowner should part with and the other party have the exclusive possession of the land for the purpose of cultivation, then as a general rule the transaction will be considered a lease and the relation between the parties that of landlord and tenant. * * * It would seem that the proposed duration of the agreement would be an important consideration in arriving at the intention of the parties as to the character of the relation created."

[7] Even though the landlord may reserve all title to the crops as security for the payment of his rent or his share of the produce or otherwise, the terms of the agreement may still characterize it as a lease where the tenant is given the absolute possession of the premises. In 16 Ruling Case Law, page 586, it is said in this regard: "A landlord may expressly reserve all title to the crops and produce of the land and thereby prevent the title to the crops from being considered in the tenant by reason of his right of possession or from their being considered tenants in common as to the crops. The fact that the landowner and the party cultivating the land are tenants in common as to the crops does not, as respects the occupation of the land, prevent the relation of landlord and tenant from existing; indeed, it is expressly stated in many of the cases that the contract may be a lease so as to create the relation of landlord and tenant so far as the land is concerned, while as to the crops there is a tenancy in common between the occupier and owner."

For the reason that it was the evident intent of the parties to the indenture which is involved in the present case to execute a lease and not a mere agreement of employment, and that a relationship of landlord and tenant existed between them, the Industrial Accident Commission was without jurisdiction to adjust the compensation on account of the death of the lessee. The Columbia Casualty Company was not an insurer of the deceased.

The award of damages is therefore annulled as against both petitioners.

R. L. THOMPSON, J.

This is a writ of certiorari to review an award of damages to Manuel Gomez as compensation for injuries sustained while blasting out trees with dynamite. This is a companion writ with that of the proceeding entitled "Addie Carlson et al. v. Industrial Accident Commission of the State of California, Belle Cecelia Rodgers et al.," in which an opinion of this court was this day filed. 102 Cal. App. —, 294 P. 399. The claims in both proceedings grew out of the same accident. Both applications for compensation were heard upon the same evidence. The opinion in the last-mentioned proceeding is determinative of this application.

Addie Carlson owned a fruit farm near Newcastle. She leased the farm to Manuel Rodgers on October 1, 1929, for a term of five years in consideration of an equal division of the net proceeds of the sales of crops. Manuel Rodgers took possession and proceeded to cultivate the orchards. His lease required him to "employ a sufficient number of good and skillful farmhands to do in proper time and season all of the work required on the premises," at his own expense. November 10, 1929, pursuant to this covenant, he employed Manuel Gomez as a farm hand on the premises. He paid Gomez the sum of $110 a month as wages, and furnished him with a cabin, together with necessary wood and water without charge. In the course of his employment, on February 13, 1930, while engaged in assisting his employer Manuel Rodgers in blasting out trees with dynamite, he was seriously and permanently injured as a result of a premature explosion.

Addie Carlson, the owner and lessor of the ranch, was a member of the Newcastle Fruit Growers' Association. She held an accident insurance policy with the petitioner Columbia Casualty Company, which provided that company "Does hereby agree with this employer * * * [Addie Carlson] as respects personal injuries sustained by [her] employees, including death at any time resulting therefrom," to compensate them for such injuries. Manuel Rodgers and his employees were not insured with this or any other casualty company, notwithstanding the fact that his lease with Mrs. Carlson covenanted that he should "carry and pay for at his own * * * expense accident and liability insurance."

Upon petition, the Industrial Accident Commission found that Manuel Gomez was injured in the course of his employment as a farm hand while engaged in the service of Addie Carlson, who was insured against such accidents by the Columbia Casualty Company. The commission then awarded Gomez damages in the aggregate sum of $4,070. This writ of certiorari was thereupon instituted by the petitioners.

The record leaves no doubt of the fact that Gomez was employed by Manuel Rodgers, the lessee of the Carlson fruit ranch, and that he was not an employee of Addie Carlson. It is equally apparent that Gomez was not a beneficiary under the accident policy which was held by Addie Carlson. If Rodgers was a tenant and lessee of Addie Carlson and he employed Gomez as a farm hand, he and his sureties alone would be liable for injuries sustained in the course of such employment. In the absence of a contract to that effect, the landlord, under no circumstances, would be liable for injury to her tenant's employees. In the case of Carlson v. Industrial Accident Commission, supra, we have held that the indenture which determines the relationship of Carlson and Rodgers is a lease and not an agreement of employment. We are unable to see any way to escape that conclusion. Upon the authority of that case we are impelled to hold the respondent Manuel Gomez was not an employee of petitioner Addie Carlson, and that neither she nor her surety, the Columbia Casualty Company, is liable for the injuries sustained by Gomez.

The facts of this case present a sad tragedy. Human sympathy would urge any tribunal of justice to require compensation from the parties who are liable. It would, however, be a miscarriage of law and justice to arbitrarily take money from an individual or a corporation not morally or legally liable, to pay to another regardless of the seriousness of his injuries.

For the reason that Manuel Gomez did not sustain the relationship of employee to Addie Carlson, and that he was therefore not included as a beneficiary of the policy held by the lessor of the ranch, the Industrial Accident Commission was without jurisdiction to adjust compensation for the injuries sustained.

The award of damages is therefore annulled as to both petitioners.

Dec. 18, 1930.

1. Municipal corporations ⇨226.

Mode of making municipal contracts prescribed by law is exclusive.

2. Municipal corporations ⇨225(5).

Resolution of city commission accepting broker's bid for realty held ineffectual to impose contractual liability on city for sale of property or for broker's commissions because charter limitations were not followed (St. 1915, pp. 1752, 1782, §§ 49, 135).

Charter of city of Alhambra (St. 1915, pp. 1752, 1782, §§ 49, 135) provides that only method for sale or lease of public property shall be by ordinance, except in cases where city commission takes action in pursuance of general state law. Section 135 provides manner of making contracts after competitive bidding, and provides that city shall not be bound by any contract unless provisions thereof are followed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. T. B. Warne, Judge.

Action by N. W. Milligan against the City of Alhambra. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Fred W. Morrison, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

R. D. Wickham, City Atty., of Alhambra, for respondent.

SPENCE, J.

Plaintiff brought an action against defendant, city of Alhambra, to recover the sum of $5,050 alleged to be due as a real estate agent's commission. The action was tried by the court sitting without a jury upon an agreed stipulation of facts, and, from a judgment in favor of defendant, plaintiff appeals.

In November, 1926, notice was published stating that the cities of Pasadena, South Pasadena, and Alhambra would receive sealed bids for their respective interests in property known as the Tri-City Farm. The city of Pasadena owned an undivided four-sixths interest in the property, while the other two cities each owned an undivided one-sixth interest. The notice provided the method for submitting bids upon the basis of a price per acre, a bid to be submitted to each city covering its undivided interest. The notice stated that the three cities intended to reject bids unless the bidders filed bids with all three cities at the same price per acre. It further provided: "Bidders must state specifically whether the price per acre is a net price to the three cities or whether a commission is payable out of said net price, and if any commission is payable, the amount of said commission." On November, 1926, plaintiff submitted a bid in his own name to the defendant city, which bid recited that it was made "on behalf of my Syndicate." It further stated: "This offer is made subject to the regular Realty Board Commission of five per cent (5%) on the total purchase price—to be paid to me." It was stipulated on the trial at the time the bid was submitted "plaintiff had a syndicate composed of various persons who were ready, able and willing to buy said property for the price and upon the terms stated." On November 30, 1926, the commission of the defendant city adopted a resolution accepting plaintiff's bid and, in response to an inquiry by plaintiff, the city manager wrote to plaintiff on December 20, 1926, advising him of the action of the commission. In this letter it was stated that "the City of Alhambra cannot go into escrow in this matter until thirty days after publication," and further that "to date the Board has not taken any adverse action in this matter, nor indicated a desire to rescind action as above outlined." On December 21, 1926, the commission adopted a second resolution rescinding its resolution of November 30th and rejecting plaintiff's bid. The reason for the adoption of the second resolution does not appear, nor does it appear that any sale was ever consummated.

Appellant contends that the rule that a real estate agent is entitled to his commission when he has procured a purchaser ready, willing, and able to buy the property at the price and upon the terms stated is too well settled to require citation of authority. However, appellant is asserting a rule relating to the performance of a real estate agent's contract and not a rule relating to the creation of such contract. The first question to be determined is whether a contract between appellant and respondent city ever came into existence.

[1, 2] The charters of municipal corporations generally provide the manner in which contracts of the municipality may be made and the charter of the city of Alhambra so provided. Stats. 1915, p. 1740. It is generally held that, where the mode of making municipal contracts is prescribed and limited by law, such mode is exclusive, and the municipality can make a contract only in the manner provided. McQuillan on Municipal Corporations (2d Ed.) § 1281; Times Publishing Co. v. Weatherby, 139 Cal. 618, 73 P. 465; Frick v. City of Los Angeles, 115 Cal. 512, 47 P. 250; City of Louisville v. Parsons, 150 Ky. 420, 150 S. W. 498; City of Astoria v. American La France Fire Engine Co. (C. C. A.) 225 F. 21.

Article 6, § 49, of the Charter, provided: "No action providing for any specific improvement or the appropriation or expenditure of any public money, except a sum not exceeding one thousand dollars; for the appropriation, acquisition, sale or lease of public property; for levying any tax or assessment; granting any franchise; for establishing or changing fire limits or districts, or for imposing any penalty, shall be taken except by ordinance except in cases where the commission takes action in pursuance of a general law of the state." Article 19, § 135, of the Charter, provided for the manner of making contracts after competitive bidding and for the manner of making contracts involving the payment of money not exceeding a thousand dollars. The opening sentence of that section reads in part: "The City of Alhambra shall not be and is not bound by any contract * * * unless * * *" It is apparent from the reading of the foregoing sections and other sections of the charter that the mode by which the city might enter into contracts providing for the expenditure of public money was prescribed and limited.

It is not contended that the mode provided under article 19, § 135, was followed. The only other mode in which a contract for the expenditure of public money might be made was that provided in article 6, § 49. That section required that such action be taken by ordinance. Appellant relies entirely upon the resolution of November 30. Appellant concedes that this resolution was ineffectual to impose a contractual liability for the sale of the property, but contends that the agent's commission stands on a different footing. We find no merit in this contention. No ordinance was passed relating to any contract with appellant either for the payment of the commission or the sale of the property and the adoption of the resolution referred to was insufficient under the charter to impose a contractual liability upon the respondent city.

Judgment is affirmed.

Appellant's first point was that action did not properly come within Torrens Law (St. 1915, p. 1932), and, in support thereof, portion of law was set forth together with one paragraph of complaint relied on to show that action did not come within terms of law. The second point was that respondents were guilty of negligence, and, while brief does not set up all evidence, substance of considerable evidence is set forth, together with some thirty-five parenthetical references to line and page of transcript. The third point was that question had been settled under res judicata rule, and in support of that point appellants set forth some considerable quotation from transcript.

3. Appeal and error ⇐757(3).

Appellant, having set out portions of evidence relied on by him, need not set forth other portions desired by respondent.

[1-3] This is a motion to dismiss an appeal and affirm a judgment, based upon the contention that the appellant has not printed in his opening brief, or any supplement thereto, as required by section 953c of the Code of Civil Procedure, such portions of the record as are necessary for a determination of the appeal, and that the appellant has not stated in his opening brief, as required by rule 8 of the Rules applying to the Supreme and appellate courts, the substance of the record and the pleadings to the extent required by said rule, and necessary to a proper understanding of the points raised.

Under section 953c of the Code of Civil Procedure and the above-mentioned rule 8, as now existing, it is sufficient to set forth in the brief the substance of the record, parenthetically referring to the line and page of the typewritten transcript for verification. The nature of the action and substance of the pleadings may be stated in general terms, and only such portion of the pleadings need be printed in the brief, as may be necessary to an understanding of the points raised. Montanez v. Beard, 207 Cal. 379, 278 P. 858; Irer v. Gawn, 99 Cal. App. 17, 277 P. 1053; Pacific States Corporation v. Rosenshine (Cal. App.) 290 P. 609.

This action is one to recover from the "Torrens Title Assurance Fund" in the custody of the state treasurer the value of certain lands in Imperial county on account of an erroneous registration of said land under the Torrens Law (St. 1915, p. 1932), due to an alleged fraud in securing the registration of said title, whereby it is claimed the superior court of the county of Imperial was deceived and imposed upon. In his opening brief appellant sets up three points as grounds for reversal. The first point is that this action does not properly come within the Torrens Law. In support thereof, a portion of the Torrens Law is set forth in the brief, together with one paragraph of the complaint, which are relied on to show that the action as brought, does not come within the terms of that law. The second point urged is that the respondents were themselves guilty of negligence, and therefore, under the provisions of the Torrens Law, are not entitled to recover. While appellant's brief does not attempt to set up all of the evidence in this regard, the substance of considerable evidence is set forth, together with some thirty-five parenthetical references to the line and page of the transcript. Without passing upon the merits of the point raised, we think enough is thus set forth in the opening brief to call for careful study and consideration of the matter. The third point raised is that the question here at issue has already been settled under the rule of res judicata in another action, in another jurisdiction. In support of that point, appellant sets forth some considerable quotation from the transcript, showing portions of the opinion and decree in such other action, which portions of the record appear to present a real question.

We are unable to hold that the appellant has failed to comply with the requirements of the rule and Code section referred to. It is apparent that a considerable part of respondents' objection to appellant's brief is addressed, not so much to the failure of appellant to set forth or refer to portions of the evidence relied upon by him as showing error, as to his failure to also set forth other portions of the record which are desired by respondents, in support of their view of the case. We do not understand that any such duty rests upon the appellant.

We are of the opinion that the brief of the appellant shows a sufficient compliance with the rules, as against such a motion, and the motion is therefore denied.

1. Garnishment ⇨17, 63.

Public policy denounces as unfavorable to proper functioning of governmental institutions any attachment or garnishment of their funds or salaries of their agents.

2. Garnishment ⇨18.

Statute authorizing garnishment of moneys due from state, or department, board, or officer thereof to judgment debtor, constitutes grant of privilege rather than sanction of inherent right (Code Civ. Proc. § 710, as amended by St. 1929, p. 1047, § 1).

3. Garnishment ⇨63.

Salary of instructor in public schools held not subject to garnishment in favor of judgment creditor (Code Civ. Proc. § 710, as amended by St. 1929, p. 1047, § 1).

Salary of instructor in public schools of city was not subject to provisions of Code Civ. Proc. § 710, as amended by St. 1929, p. 1047, § 1, because judgment against instructor was not founded on claim entitling it to lodgment with state department or officer thereof, and judgment debtor was not officer of state nor of municipality.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walter S. Gates, Judge.

CRAIG, J.

A judgment having been entered in the superior court dismissing an alternative writ of mandate and sustaining a demurrer to the petition for a peremptory writ, the petitioner has appealed therefrom.

The uncontroverted facts are that appellant as a creditor of an instructor in the public schools of the city of Los Angeles obtained a judgment in the municipal court, which was duly authenticated and filed with the respondent as auditor of Los Angeles county. The auditor declined to honor the same or to draw his warrant for the amount demanded, whereupon the plaintiff petitioned the court below for a writ of mandamus requiring its issuance under the provisions of section 710 of the Code of Civil Procedure. A demurrer was interposed by respondent upon the ground that said petition did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The sole question presented involves the construction and application of the above-mentioned section as amended (Stats. 1929, c. 634, p. 1047, § 1), the pertinent parts of which are as follows: "The duly authenticated transcript of a judgment, for money, against the defendant, rendered by any court of this state may be filed with the state department, board or commission or officer thereof, from which money is owing to the judgment debtor in such action, or if the defendant be an elective officer or officer receiving a statutory salary, with the controller of the State of California, or the auditor of any county, city and county, city or other municipal or public corporation, from which money is owing to the judgment debtor in such action * * *, whereupon it shall be the duty of any such official, or of such public officer with whom such transcript shall have been filed, to draw his warrant in favor of or to pay into the court from the docket of which the transcript was taken, so much of the money, if sufficient there be, * * * which belongs to or is owing to the judgment debtor in the cause designated in said transcript as will cancel said judgment. * * *"

[1-3] This section has been recognized, and is here admitted, as special legislation calculated to provide a method for the subjection of debts due from the state or certain of its specified political subdivisions to liens of judgments. Irlarry v. City of San Diego, 186 Cal. 535, 199 P. 1041; Walker v. Rich, 79 Cal. App. 139, 249 P. 56; Gamble v. Utley, 86 Cal. App. 414, 260 P. 930. Our courts have frequently held that public policy denounces as unfavorable to the proper functioning of governmental institutions any attachment or garnishment of their funds or the salaries of their agents, but that this especial enactment is not such legislation. Walker v. Rich, supra; Ruperich v. Baehr, 142 Cal. 190, 75 P. 782; Irlarry v. City of San Diego, supra. Hence, the statute in question must be accepted and applied rather as a grant of a privilege than as the announcement or sanction of an inherent right, and its scope measured accordingly. With these principles in mind, it becomes obvious that the petitioner's contention, the effect of which would be to include wages and salaries of various municipal employees, is untenable. His claim is not such as may be "filed with the state department, board or commission or officer" of a state department, board, or commission. It is conceded that the judgment debtor is not an elective officer or officer receiving a statutory salary, and has no money due from the state. This precludes an attempt to invoke the remaining clauses providing that: "If the defendant be an elective officer or officer receiving a statutory salary, [the judgment may be filed] with the controller of the state of California, or the auditor of any county, city and county, city or other municipal or public corporation." We conclude that since the judgment is not founded upon a claim entitling it to lodgment with a state department or officer thereof, and the judgment debtor is not an officer of the state nor of a municipality, the fund in controversy, as salary of an instructor in the public schools, in custody and control of the county auditor, is not subject to the provisions of section 710 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

The judgment is affirmed.

Prisoner held entitled to time credits under resolutions allowing credits except to those named whose credits were forfeited, though board had previously ordered his credits forfeited.

Prisoner had been released on parole, but parole had been suspended, and he was returned to prison on May 20, 1928, and on November 17, 1928, state board of prison directors ordered his credits earned and to be earned forfeited. On July 13, 1929, however, board adopted resolution allowing credits for six months' period ending June 30, 1929, to all prisoners excepting those named whose credits for such period had been forfeited. FINCH, P. J.

This is an appeal by the people from an order of the superior court of Sacramento county discharging the above-named George F. Davis from imprisonment in the state prison.

[1] The petition for a writ of habeas corpus filed in the superior court is somewhat uncertain and defective. The return by the warden of the state prison supplies some of the defects of the petition. The matter was tried in the superior court on the theory that the matters presented by this appeal were properly in issue, and no objection having been made in the trial court, it is now too late to raise the question of the insufficiency of the petition.

[2] The prisoner was received at the state prison February 1, 1925. Thereafter the term of his imprisonment was fixed at six years. November 9, 1927, he was released on parole; May 16, 1928, his parole was suspended; May 20, 1928, he was returned to prison; November 17, 1928, the state board of prison directors ordered all of his credits earned and to be earned forfeited. Notwithstanding the fact of such forfeiture, however, on July 13, 1929, the board adopted a resolution allowing "credits for the six months' period ending June 30, 1929, * * * to all prisoners * * * serving sentences pursuant to the provisions of section 1168 of the Penal Code * * * excepting those of said prisoners who are hereinafter named whose credits for said period have been disallowed, forfeited or revoked * * * the following are the names of the prisoners hereinbefore referred to whose credits have been disallowed, forfeited or revoked." This is followed by a list of prisoners in which the petitioner's name does not appear. On January 11, 1930, the board adopted a similar resolution in which again the petitioner's name does not appear among the list of prisoners whose credits had been "disallowed, forfeited or revoked."

The uncontradicted evidence shows that, if the petitioner is entitled to credits for the two periods mentioned, the length of his term was thereby reduced $4\frac{1}{2}$ months. This court on August 19, 1930, in Ex parte Solman, 291 P. 224, considered the identical question presented by this appeal and held contrary to appellant's contention. In that case a hearing was denied by the Supreme Court on September 17, 1930.

For the reasons stated in the opinion in that case the order herein is affirmed.

All concur.

1. Judgment ⇨253(1).

Amount erroneously demanded in cross-complaint for conversion became immaterial, where relief granted was consistent with law and embraced within issues (Code Civ. Proc. § 580).

In action to recover purchase price of personalty, defendant filed cross-complaint for damages for conversion, and alleged value of property to be $5,500, but prayer for relief only alleged damages in sum of $3,368. Allegations of cross-complaint were denied by plaintiff, and therefore reasonable value of property as alleged was directly put in issue.

2. Judgment ⇨253(1).

Where issue was properly joined on amount of damage for conversion, judgment properly followed measure of damages prescribed by code, notwithstanding erroneous prayer for relief (Code Civ. Proc. § 580).

TYLER, P. J.

Action to recover the purchase price of personal property. The subject of the sale consisted of the equipment and good will of a certain garage. The property was sold under a conditional sales contract. The purchase price was $5,500. Pursuant to the terms of the contract, defendant paid to plaintiff the sum of $3,000 at the time of its execution, and agreed to pay the balance on or before a certain date with interest at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum. Defendant having failed to pay, plaintiff commenced an action for said unpaid balance with interest, and subsequently took possession of the property and converted the same to his own use. Defendant filed an amended answer and cross-complaint. In the second count thereof he alleged the value of the property converted by plaintiff to be $5,500, and that by reason of the conversion he was damaged in the sum of $3,368, the amount of principal and interest he had paid under the contract. The court found that, by reason of the commencement of the action against defendant for the full unpaid balance due under the contract, the title to the property thereby became vested in defendant and the subsequent taking of the same by plaintiff constituted a conversion. The court further found the value of the property at the time of conversion to be $4,950. As conclusions of law, the court found as follows: That plaintiff was entitled to the balance of the purchase price due from defendant amounting to the sum of $2,500, together with interest from the date of the execution of the contract amounting to $350 and an attorney's fee of $250 making a total of $3,100; that defendant was entitled to recover from plaintiff the reasonable value of the property converted, which was fixed at $4,950; that the sum of $3,100 due from defendant to plaintiff should be offset against the sum of $4,950 due from plaintiff to defendant; that defendant was therefore entitled to a judgment against plaintiff for the sum of $1,850.

[1, 2] Plaintiff appeals from the judgment in favor of defendant on his cross-complaint, and he contends that by reason of the allegation of and prayer for damages in the sum of $3,368 instead of $5,500, the alleged value of the property, defendant's measure of damage on his cross-complaint thereby became limited to $3,368, and that deducting therefrom the sum of $3,100, which the court found to be due from defendant to plaintiff, the net relief due to defendant amounted to $268 instead of $1,850, as found by the court. There is no merit in the contention. It is true that defendant erroneously concluded that his measure of damage was the amount he had paid under the contract, plus interest, instead of the reasonable value of the property at the time of the conversion. All of the allegations of defendant contained in his cross-complaint, however, were denied by plaintiff. The reasonable value of the property having been alleged to be $5,500, its value was directly put in issue. This being so, the amount erroneously demanded in the prayer became immaterial, as the relief granted is consistent with the law and embraced within the issues. Code Civ. Proc. § 580. Kimball v. Swenson, 51 Cal. App. 361, 366, 196 P. 781. The relief embraced within the issue was the damage for plaintiff's conversion. Issue having been joined on this subject, the judgment properly followed the measure of damage prescribed by the Code for such cases. Johnson v. Polhemus, 99 Cal. 240, 33 P. 908.

[3] Plaintiff further complains of the lack of an express finding as to the amount of damage suffered by defendant. The court, as above recited, found that the property was wrongfully converted, and that its reasonable value at that time was $4,950. This being so, it necessarily follows what damage accrued to defendant. McCray v. Burr, 125 Cal. 638, 53 P. 203.

The judgment is affirmed.

CARY, P. J.

Plaintiffs brought this action against defendants to recover damages alleged to have been sustained by reason of the breaking of branches and fruitspurs on certain cherry trees on plaintiffs' property. The court found against the plaintiffs and gave judgment for defendants, from which plaintiffs prosecute this appeal, urging as their main ground "that the evidence does not support the decision."

[1] The evidence showed that one of the defendants was a deputy sheriff, and that the others were men engaged by the sheriff to pick a crop of cherries from the trees of the plaintiffs for the purpose of satisfying an execution against the plaintiffs. There was a substantial conflict in the evidence as to whether or not the picking had been done in such a manner as to injure the branches and fruitspurs of the trees. The trial court's finding in favor of the defendants on that issue, therefore, cannot be disturbed.

[2-4] Plaintiffs contend, however, that since the property was covered by a declaration of homestead, the only way it could have been reached for the satisfaction of an execution was by proceedings under Civil Code, § 1245 et seq., that, since such procedure was not followed, the entry upon plaintiffs' property was unlawful, and therefore plaintiffs should be entitled, in any event, to nominal damages. Before this contention could be sustained, it would be necessary for plaintiffs to prove the existence of the homestead. The plaintiffs merely alleged that some two years before the alleged injury one of the plaintiffs had caused a declaration of homestead to be recorded. Due to a defective denial of this allegation, the truth thereof must be deemed admitted. No proof was given as to the essentials necessary to the creation of a homestead. The mere recording of a declaration of homestead is no sufficient proof of the existence of the homestead, but, in addition thereto, and as a foundation therefor, every fact essential to the existence of the homestead must be proved. Apprate v. Faure, 121 Cal. 466, 53 P. 917; Machado v. Machado, 36 Cal. App. 646, 648, 172 P. 1124; and Williams v. Nieto, 98 Cal. App. 615, 618, 277 P. 513. Plaintiffs, having failed to show the existence of a homestead, likewise failed to show the illegality of the sheriff's entry.

The judgment is affirmed.

STURTEVANT, J.

The plaintiff commenced an action against the defendants to recover a judgment quieting title to a house and lot in Los Angeles county. The defendants answered, and a trial was had before the trial court sitting without a jury. The trial court made findings in favor of the plaintiff, and from a judgment entered thereon the defendants have appealed and have brought up typewritten records.

The plaintiff and Alice Sylvester, now deceased, were husband and wife. The defendants are respectively their daughter and their son. On August 2, 1912, Mr. and Mrs. Sylvester purchased the house and lot from Ruth P. Williams. At the time the purchase was made, the plaintiff possessed a small amount of money, which was his separate property. They used that money in making the down payment. The husband was employed as a mechanic, and his wages were used to make the deferred payments. After the property was purchased, a small store was installed on the property, and during the daytime the store was attended by Mrs. Sylvester, and, when the husband was at home, he assisted in attending to the store. The profits of the store also went into the payments made on the house and lot. All payments had been made as early as the month of April, 1914. The wife had a fairly good education, but the husband had only a slight knowledge of French and less knowledge of English. The deed of August 2, 1912, from Ruth P. Williams was made directly to Alice Sylvester. On October 4, 1912, the husband executed a grant deed to his wife. On January 24, 1924, the husband executed a quitclaim deed to his wife. Some time before her death Mrs. Sylvester made a purported will in which she attempted to convey the entire title to their two children, these defendants. The defendants contend that the deeds made by the plaintiff and the will made by their mother vested the title wholly in them, and that the trial court erred in making findings in favor of the plaintiff. The plaintiff replies that the case presented nothing but questions of fact, that those questions of fact rested on conflicting evidence, and that the ruling of the trial court in his favor can not be disturbed on appeal.

When the action was called for trial, the plaintiff took up the burden of proof, and throughout the trial continued to bear the burden of proof. Thereafter the trial court made a finding with reference to each one of the deeds above mentioned. As to the deed from Ruth P. Williams, the court found: "That substantially all of the negotiations for and details of said purchase of the above-described real property in said city of Los Angeles were conducted and arranged by the plaintiff's said wife, Alice Sylvester; that at the time of said purchase of said property, said Alice Sylvester, stated and represented to the plaintiff, William Sylvester, that it would make no difference as to how the title was conveyed or whether the said above described property was received by plaintiff or her, and that in any event, under the laws of California, whichever one of them outlived the other would receive the whole of the said property but that it would be for both of them while both lived." As to the deed dated October 4, 1912, the trial court found: "That in these circumstances and shortly prior to October 4th, 1912, said Alice Sylvester stated and represented to the plaintiff, William Sylvester, that it was necessary for him to sign and acknowledge a written document or paper which she had caused to be prepared for the purpose of authorizing her to sign bills or receipts for groceries delivered and to be delivered, from time to time, at and to said grocery store; that she directed plaintiff to the office of a notary where said paper or written document had been prepared and requested him to sign and acknowledge the same." In that same connection the trial court also found that the plaintiff believed the representation so made, acted thereon, could not and did not read the instrument, and that the same was not read to him, but that he executed it in reliance on the representation so made to him.

As to the deed executed January 23, 1924, the trial court found: "That at or about the time of said transaction last hereinabove described, and shortly prior to January 23rd, 1924, said Alice Sylvester stated and represented to the plaintiff that he and she, the said William Sylvester, and Alice Sylvester, might lose their home (meaning and referring to the hereinabove described property involved in this action) if any person should obtain judgment against them for the recovery of damages arising or resulting from the operation of an automobile which they had previously acquired and had been and then were driving and operating; that said Alice Sylvester then further stated and represented to the plaintiff that she had caused her said attorney to prepare a writing or document which, if signed and acknowledged by the plaintiff and said Alice Sylvester, would remove said danger of loss of their said home and make it impossible for said property to be taken by any person to satisfy any judgment or claim for damages arising from the operation of said automobile; that said Alice Sylvester then requested plaintiff to sign and acknowledge said written instrument for the purposes which she had so stated to him and she directed him to an office in said city of Los Angeles where said written instrument was then held awaiting his signature there-to." In connection with the finding last quoted, the trial court also found that the plaintiff believed the representation, executed the deed, did not read it, nor was it read to him, nor did he know the meaning or contents thereof.

Without reciting the evidence, it is sufficient to state that each of said findings was fully supported by the evidence given by the plaintiff while a witness on the stand. Furthermore, he called other witnesses who testified that Mrs. Sylvester frequently referred to the property as our place, and that she never spoke of it as mine. The defendants call to our attention that on one occasion the plaintiff and his wife were discussing street improvements, and that plaintiff said: "Well, the property is yours; attend to it." The plaintiff took the stand and denied making any such statement. While dwelling on the statement just quoted, it is well to note that said statement is the only piece of evidence in the record which tends to contradict the story as told by the plaintiff. We think it is clear that there was evidence in the record which supported the findings made by the trial court. The defendants rely on the provisions of section 164 of the Civil Code and the presumption therein stated. It is sufficient to state that the direct testimony given by the plaintiff and his witnesses operated to dispel said presumption, if such evidence was believed by the trial court. The defendants also cite and rely on Donze v. Donze, 88 Cal. App. 769, 264 P. 294. We find nothing in that case that is opposed to anything which we have stated above. At page 774 of 88 Cal. App., 264 P. 294, 296, the court said: "There are, however, actually well-recognized exceptions to this rule, as, for instance, where an instrument has been procured through fraud, coercion, undue influence, or mistake." Of course, it is the contention of this plaintiff that he brought himself within the exception. As stated above, there was evidence supporting the findings of the trial court. Therefore we think his contention is clearly supported by the record.

The judgment is affirmed.

Record did not sustain claim that foreclosure notices were not posted in three public places nor posted twenty days before sale nor kept posted for twenty days (Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subsec. 32).

The affidavits admitted in evidence showed posting in three public places for the time required by law. The further claim that it was not shown that the notices were kept posted for the time required was answered by the presumption of the continued existence of the posting, in absence of evidence to the contrary, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subsec. 32.

Action by the Merchants' National Trust & Savings Bank of Los Angeles against Frank S. Snell. Judgment for plaintiff and defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

E. Neal Ames, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Rohe & Freston and Ralph E. Lewis, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SPENCE, J.

This appeal is taken from a judgment in favor of respondent bank and against appellant in an action for ejectment.

In its complaint respondent alleged that it was the owner and entitled to the possession of certain real property described as lot 50 and portions of lots 22 and 23, and that possession of said property was wrongfully withheld by appellant. The answer denied the material allegations of the complaint. Upon the trial it appeared that respondent claimed title through foreclosure of a deed of trust executed by appellant. On this appeal appellant contends, first, that respondent did not prove a good and sufficient title to the property; and, second, that the court erred in refusing to allow appellant to introduce defenses to respondent's claim of title which were properly admissible under the general denial.

[1, 2] Appellant's first contention is based upon various alleged deficiencies in the proof of the notices given of the foreclosure sale. It is claimed that it did not appear that the notices were posted on each lot nor that notices were posted in three public places nor that the notices were posted twenty days prior to the sale nor that the notices were kept posted for said period of twenty days.

We believe that appellant's claims relating to the notices of sale are without merit. Witnesses testified regarding the notices and certain affidavits relating thereto were offered and admitted in evidence without objection. It appears that the lots described in the deed of trust were contiguous and that the house located upon the property covered all three of the lots involved. Three notices were posted upon the house. Although the witness who posted the three notices upon the house stated upon direct examination that he posted one of said notices on each lot as described in the notice, his testimony shows that at the time of trial he was not certain that a notice was posted on each of the lots described. However, we deem this immaterial. As lot 50 and the portions of lots 22 and 23 described in the deed of trust and in the notices constituted one contiguous piece or unit of land upon which was located a house covering all three lots, we are of the opinion that it was not necessary to post three notices, one on each lot or portion of a lot as described in the deed of trust. The posting of notice upon the house was sufficient posting "in some conspicuous place on the property to be sold" under section 692 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The second and third claims of appellant relating to the notices are not borne out by an examination of the record. The affidavits admitted in evidence showed posting in three public places for the time required by law. The further claim of appellant that it was not shown that the notices were kept posted for the time required is answered by the presumption of the continued existence of the posting in absence of evidence to the contrary. Code Civ. Proc., § 1963, subsec. 32.

[3, 4] Appellant's second main contention relates to rulings of the court sustaining objections to certain questions propounded to appellant while a witness. The burden is upon appellant not only to show error in these rulings, but also to show that the error is sufficiently prejudicial to justify a reversal Coleman v. Farwell, 206 Cal. 740, 276 P. 335. This appellant has failed to do. Under the denials of his answer appellant sought to introduce certain evidence relating to alleged invalidity of the original note and deed of trust. Over objection, appellant while a witness was permitted to make a rambling and incomprehensible statement regarding the circumstances surrounding the execution of these instruments. There was considerable discussion between court and counsel regarding some of the questions subsequently propounded to appellant, but nowhere in the testimony nor discussion do we find anything to show that appellant had any valid defense to the action. When a defendant fails to disclose the facts constituting his alleged defense in his pleadings or in some definite offer of proof or otherwise, we may not assume that the rulings rejecting certain fragmentary bits of evidence were prejudicial.

The judgment is affirmed.

CONREY, P. J.

Judgment was entered in favor of the defendants, pursuant to an order sustaining demurrers to second amended complaint without leave to amend complaint.

The undertaking (Exhibit A of the second amended complaint) is the statutory bond required by section 1 of the Public Works Act (St. 1919, p. 487), enacted to secure the payment of claims of persons employed by contractors upon public works, etc. Continental National Bank of Los Angeles v. Republic Casualty Co., 202 Cal. 586, 262 P. 300; Stone v. Shackelford, 64 Cal. App. 750, 222 P. 846.

[1] It is contended by respondent United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company that the record shows that the action was commenced after expiration of the ninety-day period in which such action may be filed, as provided and limited by section 2 of said Public Works Act of 1919, and that for this reason there was no cause of action on the bond. On the other hand, appellant contends that, since he filed his verified statement of claim within the time and within the manner provided by the statute, he was not limited to ninety days after the expiration of the period allowed for filing statement of claim, but might bring his action on the undertaking within a reasonable time thereafter. In this case the action in fact was not commenced until about eighteen months after filing the plaintiff's verified statement of claim with the trustees of the school district for which the building was erected. We are of the opinion the contention made in behalf of the surety should be sustained. In a recent decision the Supreme Court has held that the language "within ninety days following the expiration of the period" (for filing claims), as set forth in said Public Works Act, means "not beyond the nineteenth day after such period." Williamson v. Egan (Cal. Sup.) 287 P. 503, 505.

[2] In the foregoing statement of the case we have ignored the fact that the complaint counts upon a second undertaking in the form of a bond to owner in a sum equal to 25 per cent. of the contract price, and conditioned for faithful performance of the contract. In view of the requirement and existence of the separate statutory bond hereinbefore described, we think that the plaintiff has no right of action on the "faithful performance" bond to owner. Maryland Casualty Co. v. Shafer, 57 Cal. App. 580, 208 P. 192.

The demurrers of defendants Weller and Lindholm should have been overruled. A cause of action was stated against them, for breach of their contract to pay for the materials furnished to them by the plaintiff.

NOURSE, P. J.

Plaintiff sued on a promissory note. He had judgment against both defendants, and Sawano alone appeals on typewritten transcripts.

The due execution of the note is admitted, Sawano and the corporation being joint makers. The consideration was money admitted to have been given the corporation and used in the business of the corporation in which Sawano was a heavy stockholder. The defense to the action was that the note had been paid by the acceptance of two other notes executed by the corporation alone.

[1] The trial court found against defendants on this special defense, and on this appeal the appellant insists that this finding is not supported by the evidence. The appellant offered testimony of a number of witnesses tending to show that in January, 1926, the plaintiff delivered the note in suit to the corporation and took in lieu thereof two other notes executed by the corporation alone. In rebuttal the plaintiff offered as a witness one of the members of a "committee" which conducted the transactions at that time on behalf of defendants. From his testimony it appears that the corporation was financially embarrassed, and that, in order to obtain accommodations from the bank, it was necessary to make it appear that the note in suit was not outstanding; that, for this purpose, the committee persuaded plaintiff to deliver the note to this witness temporarily and to accept two other notes of the corporation made payable at a future date. The note in suit was delivered to the witness with the express understanding that it should be returned to plaintiff, and that appellant's obligation should not be released. The witness then testified that he took the note from plaintiff under these conditions and later returned it to him. The note was received in evidence and bore no mark of cancellation or payment. From its judgment we must assume that the trial court rejected the conflicting testimony as unreasonable or improbable.

[2] During the course of the trial the plaintiff voluntarily dismissed the action as to the corporation, and then discovered that, as the note in suit was joint, it was necessary to have the corporation as a party defendant. Its motion to restore the corporation as a defendant was granted over the objection of Sawano, but without objection from the corporation. As the corporation was a necessary party, the court was authorized to order it brought in. Section 389, Code Civ. Proc. As there is no objection by the corporation as to the time or the manner in which this was done, the order is not reviewable on this appeal.

IRA F. THOMPSON, J.

This is an appeal from a judgment of the superior court affirming a judgment of the municipal court in favor of the defendants in an action upon a promissory note. The findings of the municipal court recite that the sole consideration for the execution of the note was the purchase by defendants from the payee of the note of his interest in a business known as the Original Pit Barbecue, and that the execution and delivery thereof was upon the express understanding and agreement that, in the event the defendants were unable to keep up the payments provided for in the note, the seller and payee would retake his interest, and the liability of defendants should cease; that defendants were unable to meet the terms of the note, and requested the seller to retake his interest, which he refused to do; that the assignment and transfer of the note by the payee to the plaintiff was solely for the purpose of collection and without valuable consideration therefor. The court further found that the instrument sued upon was not a promissory note for the sum of $1,085, but a written instrument which incorporated an understanding and agreement expressed in writing on the reverse side of the note in these words: "In the event of failure to meet terms of note, said one-fourth interest shall revert to Ralph D. Maxwell" (the payee).

We are not furnished the evidence taken at the trial, nor was the superior court. We do find incorporated in the statement of the case the following: "It further appears from the evidence that the sole consideration for the so-called note was the purchase by defendants, from R. D. Maxwell, of a one-fourth interest in the equipment and business above referred to; that said note was executed and delivered by defendants under an express agreement with Maxwell that in the event the defendants were unable to make sufficient profits from said business to keep up payments provided for therein that Maxwell would retake his interest in the equipment and business and that thereupon the defendants' liability to Maxwell would terminate; that defendants were unable from the profits of the business, or otherwise, to make said payments and offered to give back to Maxwell his one-fourth interest in the business, which he refused to accept." It is obvious from this recital that, so far as the record before us discloses, the evidence fully sustained the finding of the court to similar effect.

[1] It is insisted, however, by appellant, that the writing indorsed on the back of the note was merely a contemporaneous parol agreement which should not be allowed to vary the terms of the note itself. It is to be observed, however, that the heading of the note was "Installment note (including interest) Secured by Agreement," which statement "secured by agreement" could only have reference to the writing on the reverse side. The finding of the court is in effect that it was part and parcel of the entire written agreement, and the evidence as stated in the record is sufficient for that purpose.

[2] It is also asserted by appellant that the defendants pleaded a conditional sale of the business to themselves, and that, having placed that interpretation upon the contract, are now foreclosed of their right to rely upon the finding which we have heretofore referred to. A complete answer to this argument is the answer of the defendants therein, which says: "And that upon failure of said defendants to make the payments in said instrument provided that the one-fourth interest of said Maxwell should revert to him, and the liability and obligation of these defendants thereupon terminate."

Judgment affirmed.

PER CURIAM.

Action to recover corporation taxes paid to the state under the Corporation License Tax Act (St. 1915, p. 422), as amended.

Plaintiff is the assignee of certain foreign corporations who paid license taxes for the years 1926 and 1927 under the act. The statute was declared to be unconstitutional in the case of Perkins Mfg. Co. v. Jordan, 200 Cal. 668, 254 P. 551, and taxes paid thereunder were held in Welsbach Co. v. State, 206 Cal. 556, 275 P. 436, to be recoverable.

In the present action a judgment was entered by the trial court allowing a recovery of all of the franchise taxes paid under protest and denying recovery of all paid without protest. Plaintiff appeals from that portion of the judgment denying recovery of the taxes paid without protest.

The sole question here presented is whether or not taxes collected under the unconstitutional act can be recovered back where no written protest was filed at the time of payment. Appellant's position is that the terms of the corporation license tax are so harsh and penalties provided for so severe and drastic that payment thereunder amounts to duress and such taxes are recoverable even though no written protest against the payment was ever filed.

[1-4] The coercive provisions of the act, in the event of nonpayment of the tax, provide for the fine and imprisonment of any person who attempts to transact business of the corporation, and all contracts of the corporation are declared to be void and unenforceable, and it is deprived of the right to invoke the benefit of the laws limiting the time for the commencement of civil actions. Gen. Laws, 1923, Ed. p. 554 et seq. It is obvious that payment under such circumstances cannot be

1. Taxation $\Rightarrow$ 541.

Payment of taxes is not voluntary when made under coercion and duress.

2. Taxation $\Rightarrow$ 542.

When payment of taxes is made under duress, protest is not necessary, in absence of special statute to contrary.

3. Taxation $\Rightarrow$ 542.

Payment of corporation franchise taxes held not voluntary, in view of penalties imposed on failure to pay, and therefore protest at time of payment was not necessary (Gen. Laws 1923, Act 1743, § 11).

Gen. Laws 1923, Act 1743, § 11, provided, in event of nonpayment of corporation franchise taxes, for fine and imprisonment of any person attempting to transact business of corporation, and declared all contracts of corporation void and unenforceable, and deprived it of right to invoke benefit of laws limiting time for commencement of civil actions.

4. Taxation $\Rightarrow$ 542.

Where taxing officer illegally exacts payment of taxes with notice of facts rendering considered voluntary. Payment is never voluntary when made under coercion and duress. Under the penalties provided for by the self-executing provisions of the act, a corporation is either compelled to comply with same or go out of business. Payment is therefore compulsory and not voluntary, and, when payment is made under compulsion, no protest is necessary, in the absence of a special statute to the contrary, and here there is nothing in the permissive statute relating to the subject, the statute being silent upon the question. 26 R. C. L. p. 459; 3 Cooley on Taxation (4th Ed.) § 1297; Pacific Coast Co. v. Wells, 134 Cal. 471, 66 P. 657; Grimes v. Merced County, 96 Cal. App. 76, 273 P. 839. It has been repeatedly held in this state that, where an action is brought to recover taxes illegally collected under an act which did not provide for protest, that protest is not necessary. Otis v. City and County of San Francisco, 170 Cal. 98, 148 P. 933; Brenner v. Los Angeles, 160 Cal. 72, 116 P. 397; 20 Cal. Jur. p. 968. Then, again, where an officer illegally demands money of a person, and exacts the payment thereof by coercion, when at the time he has notice of the facts which render the demand illegal, the party who pays him need not make the payment under protest in order to be able to recover it back. Meek v. McClure, 49 Cal. 623; Grimes v. Merced County, 96 Cal. App. 76, 273 P. 839; 20 Cal. Jur. p. 968.

[5] Here it appears from the record that the secretary of state, at the time the taxes were paid, had notice that the tax was being protested by other corporations. The law does not require a man to protest where a protest would be useless, and this is particularly so when the officer has notice of the illegality of the tax. Woodward on Quasi Contracts, § 244; Meek v. McClure, supra.

Further discussion of the subject would answer no useful purpose. The portion of the judgment appealed from is reversed.

Buel R. Wood, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

IRA F. THOMPSON, J.

John D. Rishell, together with his wife, Mabel L. Rishell, was charged in an information with grand theft. The first court was directed against both defendants charging them with the fraudulent appropriation of $10,000. The jury acquitted the defendant Mabel L. Rishell, but disagreed as to the defendant John D. Rishell under this count; they returned a verdict of guilty as to the second count which charged that the defendant John D. Rishell alone did unlawfully take $700 in money of the property of the Bay Cities Guaranty Building & Loan Association. It is from the judgment pronounced upon this verdict that the appeal is prosecuted.

The first contention of the appellant is that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict. The appellant organized the building and loan association, and was its president in 1928. Mrs. Rishell was a director and secretary of the company. In November, 1928, the loan association sold a piece of property to the Bank of Italy for the sum of $310,000. Edward B. Conliss was the real estate agent who handled the negotiations. He had an oral understanding with Mrs. Rishell and a Mr. Stintin, representing the Bank of Italy, that his commission to be paid by the loan association would be $5,000. During the pendency of the escrow the purchasing bank insisted that the taxes be paid by the seller. As a matter of compromise it was finally agreed that Mr. Conliss would pay one-half thereof (which was subsequently fixed at $700) and Mr. Stintin, presumably for the bank, would take care of the other half. Before the escrow was closed, however, the loan association paid approximately $2,800 taxes on the property. After the sale was consummated and on December 7, 1928, the witness Conliss testified that he went to the appellant for the purpose of collecting his commission; that they discussed the deal; that appellant asked him how much he had coming, to which he replied $5,000, whereupon appellant said, "Well, how about those taxes"; that he thereupon told appellant he could deduct the taxes if he wanted to, whereupon appellant checked the records and compromised, as heretofore suggested, on the sum of $700; that appellant then suggested he would give Conliss (the witness) a check for $15,000, and that the latter would give him back a check for $10,700, which arrangement was carried out. The appellant deposited the check in his own account and not in the funds of the loan association. A little more than a year later, to wit, on January 28, 1930, appellant wrote a letter to the loan association inclosing his check for $1,400 and interest amounting to $111.06, saying that it was to reimburse the association for the last half of the taxes of the year 1928-29, and that the withholding thereof was unconscious on his part. It should also be added that the assistant secretary of the loan association testified that appellant directed her to make an entry in the books charging the sum of $15,000 to the cost of real estate and building. It does not appear whether appellant was still connected with the company at the time he wrote the letter. A resolution was adopted by the board of directors on November 20, 1928, authorizing the sale of the property to the Bank of Italy for $295,000 net to the association. As to the item of $700 it is asserted by appellant that the proof is not sufficient for the following reasons:

"1. It cannot be ascertained from the evidence whether any demand was ever made by the officers of the association on the defendant for the alleged $700.00;

"2. That the evidence fails to disclose any misappropriation of the alleged sum;

"3. That the evidence fails to disclose any fact tending to show that the possession of said money by the appellant was not the possession of the corporation, appellant being the president of the association;

"4. That said evidence fails to show any intent to divert the said sum to the use of the appellant."

[1-3] We have set out the language used by appellant to specify the claimed insufficiency, but it is obvious that the assignments should not be treated separately, because they are all aiming at the same underlying contention, to wit: That the evidence fails to show a fraudulent appropriation of the funds of the association. It is not essential to a prosecution for grand theft of the kind here involved, as it was not for embezzlement, to establish a demand for its return. The requirement is that the evidence disclose a fraudulent appropriation of the money involved. People v. Ward, 134 Cal. 301, 66 P. 372; People v. Hatch, 163 Cal. 368, 125 P. 907; People v. Blair, 19 Cal. App. 688, 127 P. 657. We need to point out in this case that the appellant went to the extent of drawing funds from the association for the purpose of passing it through the hands of Conliss and back into his own. It is difficult to believe that this was done for an innocent and proper purpose, in view of the facts that he was well advised that the agent Conliss only claimed and was only to be paid the sum of $4,300 and the further fact that the difference was shortly deposited in appellant's own bank account instead of being restored to the funds whence it came. At least the jury were entitled to put that construction upon the circumstances. Nor do we think that the facts are consistent with the thought that appellant's possession was that of the corporation. People v. Royce, 106 Cal. 173, 37 P. 630, 39 P. 524, is of no assistance to the appellant, for the reason that the testimony in that case evidenced a disclosure by the defendant of his actions, which were manifestly consistent with a proper purpose on his part.

[4] It is next contended that the trial court erred in excluding certain stenographic notes from the evidence. Sufficient it is for a disposal of the point to say that they could only bear upon count I, which is not before us upon this appeal. In the same category is appellant's complaint that the court erred in giving an instruction relating to the invalidity of a broker's agreement for compensation when not in writing and its refusal to give an instruction concerning the ownership of the $10,000.

Judgment affirmed.

IRA F. THOMPSON, J.

This is an appeal from a judgment in a will contest declaring the purported last will and testament of Anna M. Ivey, deceased, to be void. The contest was based upon the grounds of undue influence and the unsound mind of the testatrix. The jury found that Anna M. Ivey was not mentally competent to execute a will on October 10, 1925, and also that the execution thereof on that date was obtained through the undue influence of one or more of the following: Maude A. Nelson, her husband, Elan A. Nelson, and Birdinia J. Wilson.

[1] The principal contention relied upon for a reversal of the judgment is that the evidence is insufficient to support the findings of the jury. Heretofore an appeal was taken by contestants from a judgment of nonsuit. In the decision of that case, Estate of Ivey, 94 Cal. App. 576, 271 P. 559, the court reviewed the testimony adduced and concluded that there was substantial evidence of the unsoundness of mind of the testatrix. The evidence produced in the second trial by the contestants and apparently from the same witnesses differs in a few respects from that set forth in the opinion. But the variances are insubstantial and immaterial. No useful purpose can be served by again setting forth the testimony which supports the finding of the jury that the testatrix was of unsound mind. And regardless of how we might view the evidence as a whole, if we were charged with the duty of finding facts, our duty is to sustain the verdict of the jury if there is any substantial evidence to support it. Nor is it essential for us to set forth the testimony relating to undue influence. The result would be the same, though the evidence as to the latter finding should be otherwise insufficient.

[2] It is also urged that the court commented on the evidence or rather the credibility of one of the witnesses before the jury. What happened is as follows: One of the subscribing witnesses was called to the stand and testified as to what was said and done at the time the will was executed. She was then asked whether Mrs. Ivey in her opinion "appeared to be a woman of sound mind." An objection was lodged by counsel for contestants on the ground that she was not qualified to express an opinion. The judge's attention was called to the fact that she was an attesting witness, whereupon the following statements were made:

"The Court: A different rule, of course, prevails there.

"Contestants' counsel: Not as to soundness of mind, if your Honor please.

"Proponents' counsel: Even as to soundness of mind.

"The Court: Well, I think there should be some foundation laid for it. There is still some foundation lacking.

"Contestants' counsel: May I have the code?

"The Court: She can state what she saw as to her physical condition, etc. The foundation should be laid.

"Contestants' counsel: This is merely for the signature.

"The Court: The mere fact that a person walked into a house and sees one for a few minutes, even an attesting witness has to be qualified on that.

"Proponents' counsel: I was looking for the code.

"The Court: I know what you refer to.

"Proponents' counsel: An attesting witness doesn't have to be qualified, but one who is not an intimate acquaintance.

"The Court: It is a matter of common sense. A person can't walk into a house and see a person for five or ten minutes—I am speaking generally—and witness their signature and be qualified to testify they are of sound mind.

"Proponents' counsel: Well, there is some argument about it. I know there should be some foundation laid.

"The Court: If she is to testify to that, she should be qualified. You can examine the code if you want to."

(Mr. McLaughlin examines a book.)

"The Court: Take a recess at this time. It is eleven o'clock."

(After recess.)

"Proponents' counsel: Mrs. Vohs, I believe, was on the stand. Now, if the court please—

"The Court (interposing): Now, just a moment. I will say to the jury at this time that whenever the court is ruling upon questions which are questions of law raised during the trial of the case, anything that the court may say upon the matter is not to be regarded by you as any evidence or any indication of how the court feels about it, so that any remarks I may have made or may make about this matter the jury will disregard. You need not go into the matter at all. The witness may answer the question. It is a matter for cross-examination."

We are satisfied that no damage was done to the cause of the proponents by the remarks of the judge. He did comment erroneously, but he immediately instructed the jury to disregard his remarks and permitted the witness to answer the question. And in his general instructions to the jury he informed them that the law presumes that the subscribing witnesses had their attention directed to, and noted, the mental capacity of the testatrix, and that for that reason their opinions are entitled to more consideration than would be given to one who was merely passive.

[3-5] Appellants assert that the court committed error when it refused to admit in evidence the certificate of proof of will and facts found in the matter of the estate of Anna M. Ivey. It is their contention that, this being a contest after probate, they were entitled to have the document presented for the purpose of establishing the presumption that the deceased was of sound mind. We see no merit in the contention. "The presumption is always that a person is sane, and the burden is always upon the contestants of the will to show affirmatively, and by a preponderance of the evidence, that the testatrix was of unsound mind at the time of the execution of the will." Estate of Perkins, 195 Cal. 699, 235 P. 45, 46. The court instructed the jury to this effect.

[6] The notice of appeal recites that an appeal is taken from an order denying proponents' motion for a new trial. Such an order is not appealable. The ruling on that motion is reviewable on the appeal from the judgment.

No other points require discussion.

Judgment affirmed. Appeal from order dismissed.

ASSOCIATED OIL CO. v. MULLIN et al.

Civ. 7573.

District Court of Appeal, First District,
Division 1, California.

Dec. 13, 1930.

1. Judgment $\Rightarrow$ 472.

Generally, judgment rendered by court having jurisdiction of parties and subject-matter is not open to collateral attack.

2. Judgment $\Rightarrow$ 486(1).

Void judgment may be collaterally attacked either by parties or by strangers.

3. Judgment $\Rightarrow$ 485.

Collateral attack of void judgment by parties and privies is ordinarily limited to cases where judgment is void on its face.

4. Judgment ↪511.

Stranger to judgment whose rights would be prejudiced by its enforcement may collaterally attack judgment for fraud or collusion.

5. Judgment ↪497(1).

Neither parties, their privies, nor strangers can attack judgment of domestic court of record on jurisdictional grounds unless want of jurisdiction appears on face of record (Code Civ. Proc. § 1916).

6. Judgment ↪501.

Neither parties, their privies, nor strangers can attack judgment of domestic court of record in collateral proceeding on account of mere errors or irregularities.

7. Judgment ↪497(2).

Recital in judgment that defendants appeared by demurrer is conclusive, in absence of anything in record contradicting recital.

8. Attorney and client ↪70.

Attorney appearing and entering demurrer for defendant must be presumed to have authority.

9. Pleading ↪198.

Defendants' joint demurrer held properly overruled, where complaint stated cause of action, notwithstanding uncertainty as to who purchased goods for which action was brought.

10. Pleading ↪38½.

It is essential to jurisdiction that there be some proper application invoking judicial power of court in respect to matters sought to be litigated.

11. Judgment ↪18(2).

Where complaint shows subject-matter and demand for relief within court's jurisdiction, that complaint fails to state cause of action does not render judgment void and subject to collateral attack.

12. Judgment ↪503.

Judgment rendered against person voluntarily appearing in action as defendant is not collaterally assailable, although his name was not inserted in complaint.

13. Judgment ↪129.

Default judgment reciting that copartner appeared by demurrer held not void on its face as against copartnership (Code Civ. Proc. § 388).

14. Judgment ↪570(7, 8).

Nonsuit for plaintiff's failure to prove defendant was member of copartnership constituted "final judgment" for such defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Final Decree or Judgment," see Words and Phrases.]

15. Partnership ↪206.

Defendant ceased to be party to suit after dismissal as to him for plaintiff's failure to prove defendant was member of copartnership.

16. Execution ↪161.

Court has power to quash execution, where it is inadvertently issued, or where writ is void, or where judgment on which execution is based is void on its face.

17. Execution ↪161.

Court cannot quash execution merely on ground that judgment is irregular or erroneous.

18. Execution ↪163.

None but parties to action who are liable to be injured can move for recall of writ of execution, unless judgment or writ is void on its face.

19. Execution ↪161.

Court has no power to vacate execution for omission or act of sheriff after writ has duly come into his hands.

20. Execution ↪161.

Levy on property exempt from execution is not reason for recalling writ of execution.

21. Execution ↪161.

That sheriff, directed to satisfy judgment from judgment debtors' property, levied on property of defendant obtaining nonsuit did not justify court in quashing execution.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Louis H. Ward, Judge.

Action by the Associated Oil Company against Frank D. Mullin and F. W. Hyland, individually and as copartners doing business under the firm name and style of Hyland & Mullin Drayage Company, and others. Frank D. Mullin obtained a judgment of nonsuit. From an order quashing execution issued on judgment for plaintiff, the plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

William E. Gearhart, Bernard B. Stimmel, and Ralph C. Hesthal, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

Edmund J. Holl, of San Francisco, for respondents.

PER CURIAM.

An appeal by the plaintiff from an order quashing an execution.

On September 15, 1925, the above-entitled action was commenced in the superior court in and for the city and county of San Francisco to recover for goods, wares, and merchandise alleged to have been sold for an agreed price. The complaint was in two counts, and a demurrer thereto, alleging as to each count that the same failed to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, was filed by an attorney on behalf of the defendants. The demurrer was overruled and time allowed to answer. On July 9, 1927, and answer was filed by defendant Mullin, denying the allegations of the complaint and particularly that the defendants at any of the times mentioned therein were doing business under the name and style alleged. On September 29, 1927, a default judgment was entered against defendant Hyland and Hyland & Mullin Drayage Company, reciting that these defendants had failed to answer the complaint within the time stipulated between the counsel for the respective parties. On July 9, 1928, a judgment was entered against defendant Mullin, reciting that he had failed to appear at the trial of the action. Subsequently, on motion, this judgment was set aside, and the action as between plaintiff and Mullin was tried, resulting in a judgment of nonsuit being entered in favor of the latter. This judgment, as well as that entered against the other defendants, has become final.

On May 20, 1930, execution was issued on the judgment last mentioned, reciting that a judgment against defendants F. W. Hyland and Hyland & Mullin Drayage Company had been entered and directing the sheriff to satisfy the same out of the property of the judgment debtors. The sheriff levied upon certain real property, the notice filed reciting that he had levied on "all the right, title and interest and equity therein belonging to Frank D. Mullin, the therein named defendant, or to which he may be entitled." Respondent Mullin thereupon served upon the plaintiff and filed in the action a notice of motion for an order quashing the issuance and levy of the writ, the ground for the motion being that the execution "was illegally, wrongfully, unlawfully and improperly issued." After a hearing the order appealed from was entered.

It is not contended that the judgment upon which the execution issued was void as to defendant Hyland, but only as respects the association, and this for the reason that while the association as such was joined as a party, no cause of action save as against the individuals Mullin and Hyland was stated in the complaint.

[1-6] The general rule applicable to a judgment rendered by a court having jurisdiction of the parties and subject-matter is that unless reversed or annulled it is not open to contradiction or impeachment with respect to its validity or binding effect by parties or privies in any collateral proceeding. 34 C. J. Judgments, § 815, p. 511; Rowley v. Howard, 23 Cal. 401. A void judgment, however, may be collaterally attacked either by the parties or by strangers. Estate of Pusey, 180 Cal. 368, 181 P. 648. With respect to parties and privies such an attack is ordinarily limited to cases where the judgment is void on its face. 15 Cal. Jur., Judgments, § 142, p. 56; Emery v. Kipp, 154 Cal. 83, 97 P. 17, 19 L. R. A. (N. S.) 983, 129 Am. St. Rep. 141, 16 Ann. Cas. 792; Estate of McNeil, 155 Cal. 333, 100 P. 1086. A stranger, however, whose rights would be prejudiced by its enforcement, is not bound by this limitation, but may attack a judgment for fraud or collusion. 34 C. J., Judgments, § 832, p. 526; Hackett v. Manlove, 14 Cal. 85; Bennett v. Wilson, 133 Cal. 379, 65 P. 880, 85 Am. St. Rep. 207. But neither the parties, their privies, nor strangers can attack a judgment of a domestic court of record on jurisdictional grounds unless the want of jurisdiction appears on the face of the record (15 Cal. Jur., Judgments, § 834, pp. 528, 529; Bennett v. Wilson, supra), and section 1916 of the Code of Civil Procedure does not change the rule (Hill v. City Cab, etc., Co., 79 Cal. 188, 21 P. 728). Nor can they object to it on account of mere errors or irregularities. Cloud v. El Dorado County, 12 Cal. 128, 73 Am. Dec. 526; Hall v. Brittain, 171 Cal. 424, 153 P. 906.

[7, 8] The Hyland & Mullin Drayage Company was joined as a party to the action, and the judgment recited that both the concern and defendant Hyland appeared therein by demurrer; and such a recital, in the absence of anything in the record contradicting it, has been held to be conclusive. Hahn v. Kelly, 34 Cal. 391, 94 Am. Dec. 742; Hickey v. Algie, 51 Cal. App. 595, 197 P. 359. The authority of the attorney who appeared for these defendants must also be presumed. Title Ins., etc., Co. v. Cal. Development Co., 168 Cal. 397, 143 P. 723.

[9] The complaint alleged that the individual defendants Hyland and Mullin were doing business under the name of Hyland & Mullin Drayage Company; also, that the merchandise in question was sold and delivered to the defendants. While the pleading was uncertain and ambiguous with respect to the parties to whom the sale was made, this objection was not raised; and the complaint having stated a cause of action the joint demurrer filed was properly overruled. Asevado v. Orr, 100 Cal. 293, 34 P. 777.

[10-12] It is essential to jurisdiction that there be some proper application invoking the judicial power of the court in respect to the matters sought to be litigated (Young v. Rosenbaum, 39 Cal. 646; Tinn v. U. S. District Attorney, 148 Cal. 773, 84 P. 152, 113 Am. St. Rep. 354); but if a complaint shows a subject-matter and a demand for relief within the jurisdiction of the court, the mere fact that it fails to state a cause of action does not render the judgment void and subject to collateral attack (Gillespie v. Fender, 180 Cal. 202, 180 P. 332); or, as the rule is stated in Christer-son v. French, 180 Cal. 523, 182 P. 27, a judgment is not void if the court has jurisdiction of the parties and subject-matter, irrespective of whether the complaint states a cause of action or not, so long as it apprises the defendant of the nature of plaintiff's demand. This rule applies both to contested cases (Le Mesnager v. Variel, 144 Cal. 463, 77 P. 988, 103 Am. St. Rep. 91) and to default judgments in other respects valid (Crouch v. H. L. Miller & Co., 169 Cal. 341, 146 P. 880; Christer-son v. French, supra). It has also been held that a judgment rendered against a person who has voluntarily appeared in the action as a defendant is not void so as to be collaterally assailable, although his name was not inserted in the complaint and no order granting leave to appear and answer is contained in the record. Tyrrell v. Baldwin, 67 Cal. 1, 6 P. 867.

In this connection respondent cites several cases in support of his contention that the judgment entered against the association was void; but an examination thereof shows that there was either a nonjoinder of the association as a defendant in both the caption and body of the complaint, or that the pleading was attacked on appeal for failure to state a cause of action against the association.

[13, 14] Measured by the above rules, the judgment against the drayage company was not void on its face, and there is no contention that the same was procured by fraud or collusion. Section 388 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides: "When two or more persons, associated in any business, transact such business under a common name, whether it comprises the names of such persons or not, the associates may be sued by such common name, the summons in such cases being served on one or more of the associates; and the judgment in the action shall bind the joint property of all the associates, and the individual property of the party or parties served with process, in the same manner as if all had been named defendants and had been sued upon their joint liability." Respondent Mullin denied that he was a member of the drayage company or liable for the debt, and plaintiff failed to prove these allegations. The resulting nonsuit was a dismissal of the action as to respondent. San Francisco v. Brown, 153 Cal. 644, 96 P. 281.

[15] While the entry of the order did not affect plaintiff's right to proceed against the others (Hanna v. De Garmo, 140 Cal. 172, 73 P. 830), respondent thereupon ceased to be a party (9 R. C. L., Dismissal, Discontinuance and Nonsuit, § 29, p. 209; Page v. W. W. Chase Co., 145 Cal. 578, 79 P. 278); and for all purposes connected with the further proceedings the order had the effect of a final judgment in his favor (Dowling v. Polack, 18 Cal.

625; Leese v. Sherwood, 21 Cal. 151; Hurgren v. Union, etc., Ins. Co., 141 Cal. 585, 75 P. 168). There was consequently no judgment in the action which bound the individual property of respondent though he was served with process.

[16-20] Although the court has power to quash an execution inadvertently issued (Creditors' Adjustment Co. v. Newman, 185 Cal. 509, 197 P. 334), or where the writ is void as lacking statutory and decretal authority for its issuance (Montgomery v. Meyerstein, 195 Cal. 37, 231 P. 730), or if the judgment on which it is based is void on its face (Sanchez v. Carriaga, 31 Cal. 170; Winrod v. Wolters, 141 Cal. 399, 74 P. 1037), it cannot do so merely upon the ground that the judgment is irregular or erroneous (Town of Hayward v. Pimental, 107 Cal. 386, 40 P. 545); and it is the general rule that none but the parties to the action who are liable to be injured can move for recall of the writ (23 C. J., Executions, § 426, p. 541) unless the judgment upon which it issued or the writ is void on its face. In such cases it has been held that subsequent purchasers, lienholders, and execution and judgment creditors may so move (23 C. J., Executions, § 426, p. 542, and cases cited; Dorland v. Smith, 93 Cal. 120, 28 P. 812; Montgomery v. Meyerstein, supra). In the present case, however, the judgment is valid upon its face, and the execution issued thereon was regular in form. Under such circumstances it is well settled that the court has no power to vacate an execution for the omissions or acts of the sheriff after the writ has duly come into his hands. 23 C. J., Executions, § 424, p. 540. Hence it has been held that a levy upon property exempt from execution is not a reason for recalling the writ (Roth v. Insley, 86 Cal. 134, 24 P. 853); nor can the levy be quashed on the ground that the judgment debtor has no interest in the property levied upon, as strangers to the action have means provided by law for protecting their rights (23 C. J., Executions, § 285, p. 470; Bancroft Code Practice and Remedies, § 1999, p. 2630).

[21] As stated, the action was dismissed as to respondent. Consequently he was not a party to the judgment, nor was his property bound thereby, and the sheriff was not directed by the writ to satisfy the judgment from his property, but from that of the judgment debtors. Under these facts neither the judgment nor the proceedings thereunder would affect his rights or cast a cloud upon his title. Roman Catholic Archbishop of San Francisco v. Shipman, 69 Cal. 586, 590, 11 P. 343; Russ & Sons Co. v. Crichton, 117 Cal. 695, 49 P. 1043; Brum v. Ivins, 154 Cal. 17, 21, 96 P. 876, 129 Am. St. Rep. 137.

It is our conclusion from the facts that there was no ground for the recall of the execution and that the order was erroneous,

The order is, accordingly, reversed.

In re ATKINSON'S ESTATE.

ATKINSON et al. v. ATKINSON et al.

Civ. 4325.

District Court of Appeal, Third District,
California.

Dec. 17, 1930.

Rehearing Denied Jan. 16, 1931. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 9, 1931.

1. Wills ⇨132.

Presence of typewritten words on paper on which codicils were written did not invalidate olographic codicils, of which such words formed no part.

2. Wills ⇨130.

That olographic codicil is written on one of pages of original will is immaterial, except that document mentioned in codicil is more clearly identified.

3. Wills ⇨98.

Will or codicil executed pursuant to statute may incorporate, by appropriate reference, document or paper not so executed (Civ. Code, § 1287).

Civ. Code, § 1287, provides that execution of codicil, referring to previous will, has effect of republishing will, as modified by codicil.

4. Wills ⇨130.

Olographic codicil, to be valid, need not be designated as codicil by testator (Civ. Code, § 1287).

5. Wills ⇨384.

Question presented by appeal from order admitting codicils to probate involved their testamentary character, not construction of codicils or will.

6. Wills ⇨104.

Olographic codicil, stating that children of deceased brother were to have brother's share, manifested intent to give children share brother would have received if living, although deceased brother technically had no share (Civ. Code §§ 1317, 1318, 1320, 1325, 1340).

It appeared that original will divided residue equally among testator's brother, four sisters, and three children of deceased brother, and that it would be unnatural for testator to give a total of three times as much property to his deceased brother's three children as to any of his sisters, or to his surviving brother. Civ. Code, §§ 1317, 1318, 1320, 1325, and 1340, relate to construction of wills.

Appeal from Superior Court, Humboldt County; T. H. Salvage, Judge.

Proceedings by Mary A. Atkinson and another for the probate of certain writings as codicils to the will of Thomas G. Atkinson, also known as T. G. Atkinson, deceased. From an order in favor of the proponents, admitting the writings to probate, the protestants, Lucile Atkinson and others, appeal.

Affirmed.

Mahan & Mahan, of Eureka, for respondents.

Mr. Presiding Justice FINCH delivered the opinion of the court.

This is an appeal by Lucile Atkinson, Margaret Atkinson Gardner (formerly Margaret Atkinson), and Henry Atkinson, devisees and legatees named in the last will of the above-named decedent, from an order "admitting to probate as codicils to said last will * * * two certain writings appearing on pages one and two of said last will."

The will mentioned is typewritten, and was duly attested by subscribing witnesses November 2, 1911. The second and third clauses thereof bequeath sums of money to persons named therein. The fourth clause gives money and described real estate to the decedent's wife. The fifth and sixth clauses read as follows:

"Fifth: All the rest and residue of my estate, real, personal and mixed, I give, devise and bequeath to my brother Edward Atkinson, of Escanaba, Michigan, to my sister Bessie Gleeson, wife of T. P. Gleeson of Green Bay, Wisconsin, to my sister Maggie Corcoran, of Escanaba, Michigan, to my sister Jennie Jones, wife of B. W. Jones of Vulcan, Michigan, to my sister Ella Laughran, wife of C. J. Laughran of New Mexico, and to Lucile Atkinson, Margaret Atkinson and Henry Atkinson, children of my brother John Atkinson, deceased—share and share alike.

"Sixth: My brother John being dead and leaving the three children, Lucile, Margaret and Henry—who are now minors—I will that they shall not receive their shares under the preceding paragraph of this will until the youngest thereof surviving shall reach his or her majority, and that in the meantime I appoint the above named Edward Atkinson, Bessie Gleeson, Maggie Corcoran, Jennie Jones and Ella Laughran trustees, without bond, to have and hold the shares of such children, as aforesaid, and to invest and reinvest the same as occasion requires for the best interests of such children and their said estate, the share of each in which with the accumulations thereof shall be paid to them respectively when the youngest surviving in case of death of either before distribution to them shall reach his or her majority. In case either of such children shall die without issue before the distribution to them shall be made the share of such child so dying without issue shall go to the survivors of such children, but if such child dying shall leave issue the share of such deceased child shall go to such issue share and share alike."

On July 9, 1913, the decedent drew ink lines through the words of the second and third clauses of the will, and wrote, in red ink, across the typewritten lines thereof the following:

"July 9 1913

"I cut out this part of will

"T. G. Atkinson"

At the same time and in the same manner he wrote across the lines of the sixth paragraph, but without drawing any lines through the words thereof, the following:

"July 9th 1913

"John Atkinson children are to get John share in this will

"T. G. Atkinson."

Appellants admit that the second and third clauses were effectively canceled, and the only contentions made by them relate to the writing over the sixth clause.

[1] The mere presence of typewritten words upon the paper upon which the codicil is written does not render the olographic codicil, of which such words form no part, invalid. Estate of De Caccia, 205 Cal. 719, 273 P. 552, 61 A. L. R. 393; Estate of Oldham, 203 Cal. 618, 265 P. 183.

[2-4] Appellants contend that by the olographic codicil the testator "sought to make a new will by making certain changes on the face of the old will and retaining the remaining provisions thereof that were not scratched out or written over. The altered document, as thus changed, was intended to be his revised original will." It is of no materiality that the codicil is written upon one of the sheets of the original will, except that the document referred to in the codicil is thereby more clearly identified. "It has long been settled that a will or codicil executed in accordance with the requirements of statute may, by an appropriate reference, incorporate within itself a document or paper not so executed." Estate of Plumel, 151 Cal. 77, 79, 90 P. 192, 193, 121 Am. St. Rep. 100. The codicil considered in the case cited was olographic. It certainly is no objection that a document so incorporated has been formally executed as a will. "The execution of a codicil, referring to a previous will, has the effect to republish the will, as modified by the codicil." Civ. Code, § 1287. In the case of In re Soher, 78 Cal. 477, 479, 21 P. 8, 9, it is said: "The argument is that the olographic codicil cannot be understood without referring to the attested will; that the latter is, in contemplation of law, 'a part' of the former; and that therefore it does not come within the definition of an olographic will, which is a will 'entirely written, dated, and signed by the hand of the testator himself.' * * * The only difference between an olographic and an attested will is in the form of execution. * * * One form is the precise equivalent of the other. * * * Whatever may be done in or by the one, may be done in or by the other." The document referred to in Estate of Plumel, supra, was an invalid olographic will, and the decision is based upon the terms thereof, which terms are in no manner mentioned in the codicil. See, also, Estate of Johnston, 64 Cal. App. 197, 221 P. 382, and Estate of Sullivan, 94 Cal. App. 674, 271 P. 753. It is true that the writing is not denominated by the testator as a codicil, but no reason appears for requiring greater formality in the execution of a codicil than in the execution of an original will, and many olographic wills have been held valid which were not expressly called wills by their makers. Estate of Spitzer, 196 Cal. 301, 237 P. 739, and Estate of Beffa, 54 Cal. App. 186, 201 P. 616, illustrate the liberality indulged in favor of such wills.

[5] The question presented by this appeal is whether the codicil is testamentary in character and not the proper construction to be placed upon it or upon the terms of the original will. Estate of Spitzer, supra. It is necessary, however, to determine, incidental to the question of the admission of the codicil to probate, whether it is so uncertain and meaningless as to be wholly ineffective and therefore void.

[6] Appellants contend that, because the testator's brother John had no share under the will, the reference in the codicil to "John share in the will" is meaningless, and that therefore the codicil is void for uncertainty. "A will is to be construed according to the intention of the testator." Civ. Code, § 1317. "In case of uncertainty arising upon the face of a will, as to the application of any of its provisions, the testator's intention is to be ascertained from the words of the will, taking into view the circumstances under which it was made, exclusive of his oral declarations." Civ. Code, § 1318. "Several testamentary instruments, executed by the same testator, are to be taken and construed together as one instrument." Civ. Code, § 1320. "The words of a will are to receive an interpretation which will give to every expression some effect, rather than one which will render any of the expressions inoperative." Civ. Code, § 1325. "When, applying a will, it is found that there is an imperfect description, or that no person or property exactly answers the description, mistakes and omissions must be corrected, if the error appears from the context of the will or from extrinsic evidence; but evidence of the declarations of the testator as to his intentions cannot be received." Civ. Code, § 1340.

"Particular words are not requisite to create a legacy or devise. It is essential that the intention of the testator to make the gift be shown. * * * The cardinal rule for the construction of wills is to ascertain the intention of the testator, and this is determined from the words of the will, considering the circumstances under which it was made, if there is any uncertainty in its language, * * * The will and its entire scheme, the property disposed of, the persons named as devisees and legatees, the words and the context should be considered together, and words used in the will should be construed according to their surroundings. * * * It is equally well settled that a devise or bequest may arise by implication. To warrant the court in so declaring there must be something more than conjecture. The probability of an intention to make the gift implied must appear to be so strong that an intention contrary to that imputed to the testator cannot be supposed to have existed in his mind. * * * Estate of Franck, 190 Cal. 28, 31, 210 P. 417, 418.

"The primary purpose of all interpretation of wills is, of course, to ascertain the testator's intent, as disclosed by the language he has used. * * * Of this class of questions, it may be said, with more truth, perhaps, than of any other, that each case depends upon its own peculiar facts, and that precedents have comparatively small value." Estate of Henderson, 161 Cal. 353, 357, 119 P. 496, 498.

"While, of course, conjecture and speculation cannot be indulged in to import into the will of a testator something which no language used by him warrants simply because he seems to have omitted something which it is reasonable to assume should have been provided for, still, when he has used language which can be reasonably interpreted to raise a devise, it should be so construed. * * * While the intention of the testator is to be reached from what he has said, this includes not only a determination of what he meant by the explicit use of language, but also the necessary implication arising from language which he has employed, though less explicit." Estate of Blake, 157 Cal. 448, 467, 468, 108 P. 287, 295.

In Estate of Bennett, 134 Cal. 320, 66 P. 370, the court had under consideration the following clause of an olographic will: "In case of the death of any of the legatees of my estate under this will before distribution, then and in that case the portion so bequeathed to such legatee shall revert to the children of the family of which such legatee is a member, share and share alike." It is perfectly clear that property cannot revert to a person who has never owned any interest therein, but the court found no difficulty in giving effect to the evident intention of the testator by holding that by the use of the word "revert" the testator meant that the property was to "go" to the persons indicated. In the Matter of Estate of Wood, 36 Cal. 75, the will there under consideration reads as follows: "I wish five thousand dollars to go to John C. Cole, in the event of my dying intestate," etc. It was contended that, "if this instrument is a will, then the deceased did not die intestate, and the event upon which the property was to take the direction indicated has not, and cannot, transpire." In overruling the contention, the court said: "If a word has no meaning, or is absurd, or repugnant to the clear intention manifested in other parts, it may be regarded as surplusage, or restricted in its application. * * * We see no reason why the same rule should not apply in interpreting the language of an instrument for the purpose of determining whether it is a will or not. * * * Upon the whole instrument, it is perfectly plain to our minds, that the deceased intended to make a disposition of his property, in case of his death, and he evidently meant by the term, 'dying intestate,' dying without making any further or other will."

The testator in the instant case had a brother and four sisters, each of whom had children. Another brother, John, had died, leaving three children, the appellants. Apparently the testator was on friendly terms with, and had implicit confidence in, his living brother and sisters, because he gave them equal shares in his estate and appointed them trustees of the estates of John's children, without bonds. Under such circumstances, it would be an unnatural division for the testator to give John's three children a total of three times as much property as that given to the brother or either sister. By the fifth clause of the will, the living brother and sisters were given equal shares in the testator's property. While technically inaccurate, it was not unnatural for the testator to refer to the share he would have given to his brother John, if living, as John's share. In common parlance, it is not unusual to refer to the property which one possibly or probably may receive from the estate of a relative as his share of such estate. Had John been living when the codicil was executed the term "John's share" would clearly imply a share equal to those respectively of the other brother and the sisters. It seems equally clear that the testator intended by the codicil to give John's children the share which would have been given to John if he had been living; that is, a share equal to that given to each of the living brother and sisters. Laymen would so understand the language used, and, since the testator was not a lawyer, it is a fair inference that he so understood it. The intention of the testator clearly appearing from the inartificial language used by him, that intention should be carried into effect.

The order is affirmed.

LONG BEACH FINANCE CORPORATION v. SLOCUM et al.

Civ. 6135.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 1, California.

Dec. 22, 1930.

1. Pleading ⇨428(7).

Plaintiff not objecting to evidence regarding estoppel, waived failure to plead estoppel.

2. Estoppel ⇨87.

Assignee of conditional seller held not estopped, by statement to defendant, who had already exchanged automobiles with conditional buyer, that he had paid for automobile, to deny defendant was owner.

The evidence showed that an officer of assignee corporation stated to defendant exchanging automobiles with conditional buyer that conditional buyer had paid for automobile, but evidence also showed that defendant had delivered her own automobile to conditional buyer under exchange transaction before such statement was made, so that defendant did not, in reliance upon such statement, part with anything of value or alter her position to her damage.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Carlos S. Hardy, Judge.

Action by the Long Beach Finance Corporation against Paul Slocum and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals.

Reversed.

John C. Miles, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

James McLachlan, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

YORK, J.

This is an appeal from a judgment of the trial court in favor of defendants, which judgment is based upon the theory that the plaintiff was estopped to claim that one Jessie Slocum was not the owner of the automobile, which is the real subject of this action, at the time of the commencement of the action and at all times subsequent thereto.

The legal title to the automobile was shown to be vested in appellant. The main issue of fact actually tried by the court was in relation to the claim of respondent Jessie C. Slocum that, by reason of facts which respondent sought to prove, appellant was estopped to deny that Mrs. Slocum was the owner and entitled to possession of said automobile.

[1] The record discloses the fact that the evidence relating to the so-called estoppel was introduced without any objection on the part of the plaintiff. Under the authority of Flandreau v. Downey, 23 Cal. 354, it is deemed that the plaintiff waived the lack of said so-called estoppel being pleaded before the court in this case. See, also, Carpy v. Dowdell, 115 Cal. 677, at page 688, 47 P. 695.

[2] However, assuming that estoppel was properly pleaded, appellant insists that the evidence adduced at the trial fails to establish an equitable estoppel, for the reason that one of the vital elements of estoppel is that injury must result from the acts or conduct relied upon as constituting an estoppel.

Prior to the transactions relied upon as creating an estoppel, Mrs. Slocum had entered into an agreement with one Skinner, by which she was to transfer to Skinner a car owned by her, in exchange for a car which Skinner then had in his possession under a contract of conditional sale to him, the legal title of which was then vested in plaintiff as assignee of Skinner's vendor.

The record shows that one Miller, an officer of the plaintiff corporation, stated to Mrs. Slocum that Skinner had paid for the car, which constitutes the subject of this controversy, but the record is replete with evidence showing that Mrs. Slocum had delivered her own car to said Skinner, the maker of the dishonored check which was supposed to pay for the automobile in question, before the conversation referred to took place. It is quite evident that she did not, in reliance upon plaintiff's statement, part with anything of value or alter her position to her damage; therefore no facts constituting an estoppel were proven.

The judgment is reversed.

BROWN v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR ALAMEDA COUNTY et al.

Civ. 7765.

District Court of Appeal, First District,
Division 2, California.

Dec. 16, 1930.

Rehearing Denied Jan. 15, 1931. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 9, 1931.

Divorce ⇨243.

Interlocutory divorce decree providing that order for maintenance pendente lite should continue in force until further order held to provide for alimony (Civ. Code, §§ 137, 139).

In such case it was not absolutely necessary that it should appear from the language used in the interlocutory decree that it rested on Civ. Code, § 139; it being clear that the decree did not purport to rest on section 137.

Original application by Ada Brown for writ of mandate prayed to be directed to the Superior Court, in and for Alameda County, to require T. W. Harris, judge of such court, to hear and determine petitioner's application for an execution for unpaid alimony.

Writ granted.

L. L. Steele, of Oakland, for petitioner.

Earl Warren, Dist. Atty., Ralph E. Hoyt, Chief Asst. Dist. Atty., James H. Oakley, Deputy Dist. Atty., and Pierre A. Fontaine, all of Oakland, for respondents.

STURTEVANT, J.

This is an original application for a writ of mandate. It involves the following facts: Heretofore Ada Brown commenced an action in divorce against her husband, Jolly C. Brown. In her complaint she asked for maintenance. Thereafter the trial court duly made an order for a payment of attorney fees, costs of suit, and "$60 per month for support of plaintiff payable as follows, to-wit: Upon the 11th and 27th days of each month commencing December 11, 1929, and to continue until the further order of court." Thereafter, December 17, 1929, the default of the defendant was entered. On January 6, 1930, the action was tried, and an interlocutory decree of divorce was rendered. That decree contained a passage as follows: "It is further hereby ordered that the order of court made herein on or about the 6th day of December, 1929, wherein the above defendant, Jolly C. Brown, was ordered and directed to pay to plaintiff herein the sum of $60 per month as and for the support and maintenance of plaintiff, to-wit: the sum of $30 upon the 11th day of the month, and a like sum upon the 27th day of each month, continue in full force and effect until the further order of this court." On the 6th day of October, 1930, the plaintiff filed an affidavit and applied for an execution to issue against the defendant for the sum of $515 alleged to be due and unpaid pursuant to the orders theretofore made by the court. On October 16, 1930, the court denied the application, and expressed its denial as follows: "Orders that plaintiff's application for an execution to issue be denied, and the plaintiff's application for a citation to issue for contempt, be denied, and that each of said applications are denied on the ground that the interlocutory judgment and decree of divorce January 6, 1930, volume 174 at page 479, makes no provision for the support and maintenance of said plaintiff." Now at this time the plaintiff asks this court to direct the trial court to hear and determine her application on the merits. The respondent opposes the granting of the writ, and contends that the language used in the interlocutory decree is void for uncertainty and that the same may not now be amended because the time within which an amendment may be made has expired.

As we view the matter, no amendment is necessary. It is perfectly clear that the interlocutory decree does not purport to rest on the provisions of section 137 of the Civil Code. The order made December 6, 1929, rested on said section. The interlocutory decree thereafter rendered rested on the provisions of section 139 of the Civil Code. The respondent claims that the fact last stated does not appear from the language used in the interlocutory decree. We think it does. However, it is not absolutely necessary that it should so appear. In the case of Watson v. Lawson, 166 Cal. 235, at page 241, 135 P. 961, 963, the court said: "In case of doubt regarding the signification of a judgment, or any part thereof, the whole record may be examined for the purpose of removing the doubt." 1 Freeman on Judgments, § 45. "When it admits of two constructions, that one will be adopted that is consonant with the judgment that should have been rendered on the facts and the law of the case." 1 Black on Judgments, §§ 3, 123; Peniston v. Somers, 15 La. Ann. 680." In the case of Pacific Paving Co. v. Vizelich, 1 Cal. App. 281, 82 P. 82, the language of the judgment contained the expression, "for the sum of $107.02, being the amount of principal and interest due on assessment against the lot in the complaint set forth, together with the further sum of $15, attorney's fees of plaintiff herein, and $14.80, costs in this action." Considering a similar contention at page 282 of 1 Cal. App., 82 P. 82, the court said: "We think the court was authorized to enter the judgment 'according to the prayer of the complaint,' in accordance with the stipulation or written agreement of the parties." In 1 Freeman on Judgments (5th Ed.) 134, the author states: "If the entry of a judgment is so obscure as not to express the final determination with sufficient accuracy, reference may be had to the pleadings and to the entire record. If, with the light thrown upon it by them, its obscurity is dispelled, and its intended significance made apparent, it will be upheld and carried into effect. In case of doubt regarding the signification of a judgment, or any part thereof, the whole record may be examined for the purpose of removing the doubt. One part of the judgment may be modified or explained by another part; and uncertainties in the judgment may become certain under the light cast upon them by the pleadings or other parts of the records." In the light of the foregoing rules, it is perfectly clear that the trial court, by the interlocutory decree, did not overlap the terms of the order for maintenance pendente lite, but did order that the same relief be continued until the further order of the court. It is not claimed that any further order of court was made which purported to terminate the interlocutory decree either in whole or in part.

Let the writ issue as prayed for.

CRUM et ux. v. CITY OF LOS ANGELES et al.
Civ. 117.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District,
California.

Dec. 17, 1930.

Rehearing Denied Jan. 12, 1931. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 9, 1931.

1. Escrows § 8(1).

As between vendor and purchaser, loss falls on owner at time of embezzlement from or loss by escrow holder.

2. Estoppel § 72.

Loss resulting from escrow holder's unauthorized cashing of city warrant, received for price of land, and subsequent insolvency before vendor became entitled thereto, fell on purchaser (Civ. Code, § 3543).

Defendant city sent to bank a warrant for price of land with letter instructing bank to hold check in escrow until bank received defendant's written instructions for disposal thereof. Notwithstanding instructions, bank indorsed warrant as deposited to vendors' credit, and sent warrant through for collection, and thereafter treasurer of defendant city likewise disregarding instructions paid warrant on presentation. City treasurer having paid warrant in violation of defendant's own instructions brought case within Civ. Code, § 3543, providing that, where one of two innocent persons must suffer by act of third, he through whose negligence it happened must be the sufferer.

3. Escrows § 8(1).

Evidence sustained finding vendors were not chargeable with knowledge escrow holder, in violation of instructions, cashed warrant for price and used proceeds to pay off loan to vendors.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; F. A. Leonard, Judge.

Action by W. D. Crum and wife against the City of Los Angeles and another. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal.

Affirmed.

Erwin P. Werner, City Atty., W. B. Mathews, Clarence S. Hill, George T. Warren, and Chas. C. Cooper, Jr., all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

A. H. Swallow, of Los Angeles, and Robert Richards, of Bishop, for respondents.

CARY, P. J.

Plaintiffs began this action to recover from defendants the balance due on the purchase price of certain property. The complaint gave defendants credit for a down payment of $400 and claimed that the balance of $39,837.67 was unpaid. The answer admitted the allegations of the complaint, other than the nonpayment of the purchase price, and set up full payment as an affirmative defense. The court found that the allegations of the complaint were true, except as to the amount still unpaid, gave defendants credit for a further payment of $7,823.99, and gave judgment for plaintiffs for the balance—$32,013.61.

As grounds for reversal, defendants contend (1) that the evidence does not support the finding of nonpayment, (2) that the finding that $7,823.99 was a pro tanto payment entitled defendants, as a matter of law, to a further finding that the entire amount had been paid, and (3) that the court committed prejudicial error (a) in refusing to find, as requested by defendants, that plaintiffs had both authorized and ratified certain acts of their alleged agent in receiving the balance of the purchase price and (b) in refusing to find that plaintiffs are estopped to dispute the authority of their alleged agent in receiving such payment.

Since the major portion of the defendants' argument is based upon their contention that the facts are such that but one construction can be placed upon them—a construction which they claim necessitates a judgment in defendants' favor—it will be necessary to set forth these facts in some detail.

Practically all of the transactions occurred in 1927, so we shall merely give the day and the month, adding the year only when it is other than 1927. By contract executed February 9th, plaintiffs agreed to sell and the defendant board of water and power commissioners (hereinafter referred to as the board) agreed to buy certain land in Inyo county, together with rights to the use of water for the price of $40,000. The property was to be free and clear with certain exceptions not material to this discussion. Four hundred dollars of the purchase price was paid plaintiffs when the contract was executed. The balance of $39,600, with interest, was payable when plaintiffs should furnish the board with a certificate of title showing the required title in plaintiffs and deliver to the board a deed conveying such title to the board.

The defendant board had been engaged for some period of time in acquiring an additional water supply in Inyo county. So voluminous were these transactions that the board had stationed one of its attorneys at Bishop, in Inyo county, who devoted his time exclusively to legal matters in connection with the acquisition of such water.

Plaintiffs' land was incumbered with a federal farm loan of something over $7,000, and, unless this loan was paid off by April 2d, plaintiffs believed they would have to pay another six months' interest. A preliminary title search incident to the sale to the board showed irregularities which would apparently delay the issuance of the certificate for several months. In order to escape paying this additional interest, plaintiffs, during the latter part of March, requested the First National Bank of Bishop (hereinafter referred to as the bank) to loan plaintiffs the money to pay off this farm loan. The bank agreed to do so, provided plaintiffs would retain an attorney in Bishop, whom it named, to handle the papers in connection with the deal. This, plaintiffs promptly proceeded to do. This attorney contacted the resident attorney for the defendant board and as a result of this interview plaintiffs, on March 30th, wrote the board's attorney requesting that all matters relating to the sale of the property, together with all payments, be handled through and escrowed with the bank, and at the same time plaintiffs executed a deed to the land and delivered it to the bank. On March 31st, the following occurred: The bank delivered this deed to the board's attorney, together with a letter stating in part: "This deed is submitted to you at this time subject to the final payment under contract of purchase and sale, W. D. Crum and Elinor Adell Crum, his wife, in favor of The Board of Water and Power Commissioners of the City of Los Angeles." The board's attorney delivered to the bank a warrant for $39,837.60 payable to the order of W. D. Crum and Elinor Adell Crum, together with a letter of transmittal, in part as follows: "You are hereby instructed to hold the enclosed check in your escrow until you receive our written instructions as to the disposal thereof." A carbon copy of this latter was sent direct to plaintiffs; and the bank immediately sent its cashier's check for $7,823.99 to the Federal Farm Loan Bank holding the mortgage on plaintiffs' land in full payment thereof.

Up to this point there is no complaint from either side as to any unauthorized act of the bank.

Many similar deals between the board and parties other than plaintiffs had been cleared through this bank, and the evidence showed it had been the custom of the bank, without consulting the owners of the land, to indorse the owners' names on the warrants, send them through for collection, and hold the money until the escrows were closed. There is no evidence that plaintiffs were aware of such custom. Following out this usual custom the bank, instead of obeying the board's instructions to hold the warrant, indorsed it April 1st as follows: "Deposited to the credit of W. D. Crum and Elinor Adell Crum. Endorsement guaranteed First National Bank, Bishop, California," and sent it through for collection. The treasurer of the defendant city, likewise disregarding the instructions that the warrant should be held by the bank, promptly paid it on presentation April 4th. April 8th, the Federal Farm Loan Bank, which held the mortgage on plaintiffs' property, wrote the bank at Bishop inclosing plaintiffs' canceled note and mortgage papers to be delivered to plaintiffs, sent a copy of its letter direct to plaintiffs, wrote the Farm Loan Association inclosing a $400 check to be refunded to the plaintiffs for the purchase price of the Farm Loan Bank stock which plaintiffs had purchased when they secured the loan, and sent a copy of this letter also to plaintiffs. Thereafter, the Farm Loan Association sent its check for the $400 to plaintiffs which was received by plaintiffs some time between May 11th and 21st.

At all times after the proceeds of the warrant had been received by the bank, the bank was in financial difficulty, and its cashier testified that, had plaintiffs demanded from the bank the balance of the purchase price, the bank would not have been able to pay the same. August 4th, the bank closed its doors through insolvency. Plaintiffs testified that they believed the money used to pay off their farm loan had been advanced them by the bank and that not until November—long after the failure of the bank—did they know that the Los Angeles city warrant had been cashed by the bank. Not until January 23, 1928, was the certificate of title issued showing good title in plaintiffs, and it was then tendered to the board.

It is at once apparent that the vital question in the case is: Upon whom shall the loss, occasioned by the bank's failure, fall?

Defendants contend that plaintiffs had selected the bank as their agent, that plaintiffs, knowing in April that their farm loan had been paid off, were charged with notice that the only method by which it could have been paid was the use of the purchase money represented by the city's warrant, that the bank in cashing the warrant was acting solely as agent for plaintiffs, that plaintiffs in receiving and accepting the $400 returned them by the Farm Loan Association and by accepting the benefit of the seven thousand odd dollars paid to clear off their farm loan had, as a matter of law, thereby ratified the acts of their agent the bank in cashing the warrants. They also contend that plaintiffs, having neglected from April to August 4th to take any action regarding the unauthorized cashing of the warrant and the bank in the meantime having become insolvent and the purchase money thus lost, the plaintiffs are estopped to deny the authority of the bank to cash the warrant. Plaintiffs contend, on the contrary, that they were not entitled to receive the purchase price until they had furnished the board with a proper certificate of title, that prior to such time, even though the bank had, unknown to plaintiff, cashed the warrant, it was holding the proceeds in its capacity as agent for the city, and that since it closed its doors five months before the certificate of title had been issued entitling plaintiffs to the final payment, the loss should fall upon the city, citing Hildebrand v. Beck, 196 Cal. 141, 145, 146, 236 P. 301, 39 A. L. R. 1076, and Shreeves v. Pearson, 194 Cal. 699, 707, 708, 711, 230 P. 448.

[1, 2] If the property in the custody of the escrow holder is either embezzled or lost by it, then, as between the seller and the buyer, the loss falls on the one who owns the property at the time of its embezzlement or loss. For example, if the escrow holder embezzles the purchase price before the time when, under the terms of the escrow, the seller is entitled to it, the loss falls on the buyer, since it is still his money. On the other hand, if the money be embezzled after the time when the seller has become entitled to the money, the loss falls on him, since it is now considered his property. Hildebrand v. Beck and Shreeves v. Pearson, supra. If this rule be applied to the case at bar, the money in the hands of the bank as escrow holder was lost before plaintiffs became entitled thereto, and hence the loss should fall on the defendants whose property it still remained. The defendants contend, however, that the facts do not bring this case within such rule. They argue that, in order to create an escrow at all, it is essential that the defendants should have relinquished entire control over their property, citing Fitch v. Bunch, 30 Cal. 208, 212, 213; Cannon v. Handley, 72 Cal. 133, 139-141, 13 P. 315; McDonald v. Huff, 77 Cal. 279, 282, 19 P. 499; Kenney v. Parks, 125 Cal. 146, 149, 150, 57 P. 772, that by its letter of transmittal the defendants specifically directed the bank to hold the warrant until it received written instructions as to its disposal, thereby retaining to themselves control thereof, and hence that the principles announced in these two cases do not apply. But the cases cited by defendants were concerned primarily with whether or not the parties to the alleged escrows had so far parted with dominion over deeds to their property that, upon the happening of the condition mentioned in the escrow, a delivery thereof would take place. Regardless of whether the facts in the case at bar constitute a true escrow, nevertheless the principles laid down in Hildebrand v. Beck and Shreeves v. Pearson, supra, are applicable. When defendants delivered the warrant to the bank, with instructions to hold it until further directions, obviously there was no intent on defendants' part to have the funds represented by the warrant paid over forthwith to the plaintiffs. The only reasonable construction which can be placed upon the letter of transmittal is that the defendants were appointing the bank as their agent to hold the warrant. The next step was the act of the bank in indorsing the warrant: "Deposited to the credit of W. D. Crum and Elinor Adell Crum. Endorsement guaranteed First National Bank, Bishop, California." When the warrant was presented to the city treasurer for payment, an inspection thereof would have shown that the bank was violating defendants' written instructions both in cashing the warrant and in depositing it to the account of the plaintiffs. In spite of that fact the defendants paid the warrant and by their own act thus created a situation which made it possible for the later loss to occur. Under these circumstances the situation comes within the provisions of Civil Code § 3543—that where one of two innocent persons must suffer by the act of a third, he, by whose negligence it happened, must be the sufferer.

[3] Defendants contend with great earnestness that this court must hold the plaintiffs were chargeable with knowledge of the fact that the bank had both cashed the warrant and used part of the proceeds to pay off plaintiffs' farm loan. They contend that plaintiffs must have known that the only way the farm loan could possibly have been paid off was from the proceeds of the warrant, and that plaintiffs with such knowledge ratified the bank's act by accepting and retaining the benefit of the mortgage payment and the return of their $400 stock subscription. We now proceed to scrutinize the evidence to ascertain what knowledge or notice of the bank's act was chargeable to plaintiffs. Plaintiffs were informed by the bank that it could arrange to pay off the farm loan if plaintiffs would allow a certain attorney to handle the papers. To this plaintiffs agreed. March 30th plaintiffs gave the bank a deed to the property, and on the same day wrote a letter to the board's attorney asking that the deal be cleared through the bank. The board's reply to such letter was to mail plaintiffs a copy of the board's letter to the bank dated March 31st which stated that the board was sending the bank the warrant and directing it to "hold the check in your escrow until you receive our written instructions as to the disposal thereof." Upon receipt of this letter certainly plaintiffs could have no reason to believe that the bank either intended to or could cash the warrant. Now it should be borne in mind that plaintiffs were extremely anxious to have their farm loan paid off by April 2d in order to save paying another six months' interest. It therefore must have been immediately apparent to plaintiffs that the warrant could not be used in time to make such payment. Under date of April 8th plaintiffs received from the Farm Loan Bank of Berkeley a copy of that bank's letter to the First National Bank of Bishop. This letter bore the title "Loan No. 8022. W. D. Crum" and stated in part: "We have received your letter of March 31st enclosing draft for $7,823.99 which is payment in full of the above numbered loan." Plaintiffs thus knew that the First National Bank had on March 31st forwarded its draft to pay off the farm loan. They also knew that defendants had not sent their warrant to the bank until March 31st, with what amounted to express directions not to cash it. Under these circumstances the inference which the trial court drew that plaintiffs believed that the bank, without cashing the warrant, had advanced its own funds to pay off the plaintiffs' farm loan was a most reasonable one. To a lay mind possessing only the usual limited familiarity with banking practices it would not be an unreasonable assumption under the circumstances that the bank was willing to advance from its own funds sufficient money to pay off the farm loan, relying upon the fact that when the plaintiffs finally received their money from the defendants that money would have to be paid through the bank, which at that time could deduct from the amount it turned over to the plaintiffs an amount sufficient to repay to the bank with interest the sum which it had advanced to pay off the farm loan.

The defendants submitted proposed findings to the effect that plaintiffs had authorized the cashing of the warrant, that plaintiffs had ratified the bank's act in cashing the warrant, and that plaintiffs were estopped to deny the bank's authority so to do. Defendants contend that the court's refusal to find on these three matters is reversible error, arguing that, while neither ratification nor estoppel were specifically pleaded in their answer, yet evidence on both subjects was received without objection, and therefore must be held to have been one of the issues tried by the court. In support of this contention the defendants cite Goetz v. Goldbaum, 4 Cal. Unrep. Cas. 749, 37 P. 646; Resetar v. Leonardi, 61 Cal. App. 765, 216 P. 71; Cross v. Bouck, 175 Cal. 253, 165 P. 702; McDougald v. Hulet, 132 Cal. 154, 64 P. 278; Otis Elevator Co. v. First National Bank, 163 Cal. 31, 37, 124 P. 704, 41 L. R. A. (N. S.) 529; and Blood v. La Serena Land & Water Co., 113 Cal. 221, 41 P. 1017, 45 P. 252. Regarding the alleged authorization by plaintiffs to the bank to cash the warrant and also the ratification by plaintiffs of such act of the bank, under the plea of payment set up in defendants' answer, proof both of the authorization and the ratification was properly within the issues. By the same token a finding by the court of nonpayment—the ultimate fact—covered the fact that there was neither authorization nor ratification.

Regarding the refusal to find on the question of estoppel, suffice it to say that there is no evidence in the record upon which a finding of estoppel could have been predicated.

The judgment is affirmed.

Ex parte NORQUIST.
Cr. 2037.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 2, California.
Dec. 22, 1930.

1. Extradition ⇨34.

Affidavit presented Governor of demanding state held to excuse delay in applying for extradition, if excuse was necessary.

The affidavit alleged that shortly after committing offense accused fled from demanding state, and, after great diligence was used to find him, was just located after nearly three years.

2. Extradition ⇨34.

It is unnecessary that criminal complaint excusing long delay in presenting charge against accused be presented Governor of asylum state before rendition may be ordered.

Application of Lester E. Norquist for a writ of habeas corpus to be directed to the Sheriff of Los Angeles County to secure petitioner's release from custody on a warrant of extradition.

Writ discharged, and petitioner remanded to custody.

William M. Morse, Jr., and S. A. Shoop, both of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Tracy Chatfield Becker, Deputy Dist. Atty., of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WORKS, P. J.

Petitioner is in the custody of the sheriff of Los Angeles county after requisition upon the Governor of this state by the Governor of Colorado for the extradition of petitioner, and after order of rendition by the Governor of this state made in compliance with the requisition.

The criminal complaint filed against the petitioner in Colorado states a public offense within the laws of that jurisdiction.

It is said in Scott on Extradition, at pages 98 and 99, that, as a proper basis for the issuance of a requisition for extradition by the Governor of a demanding state, a certificate of a district attorney or prosecutor of that state must show to the Governor, among other things: " * * * (i) If the offense charged is not of recent occurrence, a satisfactory reason must be given for the delay in making the application." This language is of interest here, for the reason that petitioner departed from Colorado on December 7 or 8, 1927, and that he has never again been in that state, that he arrived in California on December 27, 1927, where he has resided continually since, and that criminal complaint was never filed against him in Colorado until November 28, 1930.

[1] If the rule stated by Scott is a correct one—and we do not pause to consider whether or not it is—it is met by evidence presented at the hearing held after return to the writ of habeas corpus heretofore issued by us. An affidavit presented to the Governor of Colorado by a district attorney, for the purpose of procuring the issuance of the requisition afterward issued, contains the averment that shortly after committing the offense with which he is charged petitioner fled from Colorado, and "that thereupon great diligence was used to find said fugitive, and he has just been located, arrested and held" in California.

[2] It is contended that before rendition could have been ordered by the Governor of California, a criminal complaint, filed in Colorado, should have been presented to him containing an allegation excusing the long delay in the presentation to the Colorado courts of a charge against petitioner. No authority is cited to uphold this contention, and we are satisfied that it is without merit.

It is also insisted that before a rendition may be made of one charged with crime in another state the governor and courts of the asylum state must be satisfied that there is good reason for long delay in making the charge against the person whose rendition is sought. Without inquiring whether this rule applies to both the Governor and the courts, or, in truth, whether it applies to either, we are satisfied that in the present instance a sufficient excuse for the delay appears in the various papers going to make up the requisition. Among these papers was the affidavit of the Colorado district attorney, already mentioned. The charge against petitioner was for failure to provide for his minor child under a decree of divorce requiring him so to do. Among the papers submitted to the Governor of California was an affidavit made by the complaining witness, the former wife of petitioner and the mother of the minor child in question. It is averred in the affidavit: "Affiant * * * says that after diligent search she has just learned that the said Lester E.

Norquist is under arrest in the city of Los Angeles, State of California. * * * " The same language occurs in an affidavit, part of the record before the Governor of this state, which was made by an adult daughter of petitioner and of his former wife.

Other points are made by petitioner, but we are satisfied they are without merit.

We think the order of rendition was properly made by the Governor.

Writ discharged. Petitioner remanded to custody.

STURTEVANT, J.

[1-4] This is an appeal by the plaintiff from an order refusing to tax costs, and also from an order refusing to strike out a cost bill. Heretofore this plaintiff commenced an action against the defendant to recover the balance of the purchase price of certain Russian rubles. Thereafter judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff. The defendant made a motion for a new trial. His motion was denied, and he took an appeal. Later when he presented his bill of exceptions for settlement the plaintiff objected to the settlement and the objection was sustained. Thereupon the defendant filed in the Supreme Court an original application for a writ of mandamus directing the trial judge to settle and certify the bill of exceptions. Silverman v. Thompson, 196 Cal. 585, 238 P. 684. The writ was granted. Although the judgment granting the writ said nothing about costs, under the provisions of section 1095 of the Code of Civil Procedure the last-mentioned judgment carried costs. Nevertheless, the prevailing party did not in the mandamus proceeding file a cost bill. If he wanted costs, he should have done so. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1033, and 1110. The judgment in the main action was reversed. Levinson v. Silverman, 89 Cal. App. 416, 264 P. 796. On April 26, 1928, the defendant served on the plaintiff his memorandum of costs. The remittitur from the District Court of Appeal reversing the original judgment was filed in the office of the clerk of the trial court on May 2, 1928. The memorandum of costs which had theretofore been served was filed on May 3, 1928. The plaintiff prepared and served a notice of motion to tax and of a motion to strike it out. The hearing of that motion was noticed for May 10, 1928. After the notice and motion had been filed, the defendant served and filed another copy of his memorandum on May 7, 1928. In his motion to tax, the plaintiff made his objection to three items of expense claimed to have been disbursed in the mandamus proceeding.

Those items incurred in the mandamus proceeding were $1 for the clerk's certificate, $7.50 filing fee in the Supreme Court, and $35.50 for the cost of printing the record. The plaintiff concedes that said items could have been collected in the mandamus proceeding if the defendant had seen fit to follow that procedure; but the plaintiff contends that they may not be collected as costs in the main action. 15 C. J. 186. The defendant cites and relies on the language contained in section 1027 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Conceding that the language is somewhat broad, nevertheless it is confined to expenditures actually paid out by the prevailing party in connection with the appeal. The section does not purport to award costs in one action that were incurred in another action or special proceeding. In Chapin v. Broder, 16 Cal. 403, at page 418, the court said: "The recovery of costs is a matter regulated exclusively by statute, and the mode pointed out for that purpose must be strictly pursued." Connected with the foregoing items the plaintiff objected to a charge of $122 for printing the record on appeal in the main action. It was an admitted fact that the amount paid for said purpose was $118 and not $122. The item should have been taxed at $118 and not $122. We think the motion to tax should have been granted as to the items complained of.

[5, 6] The motion to strike the entire cost bill rests on the fact that the plaintiff's memorandum of costs was served before the remittitur had been filed, although it was filed thereafter. However, as stated above, another copy was served and filed on May 7, 1928. As to the last-mentioned copy, the record does not show that any attack whatever was made thereon. The original memorandum was prematurely served, although it was filed in proper time. The second copy was both served and filed in proper time. The order denying the motion to strike does not specify whether it refers to the memorandum served on April 26, 1928, or the one served on May 7, 1928. Under these circumstances the error, if any, was waived. 7 Cal. Jur. 294; Legg & Shaw Co. v. Worthington, 157 Cal. 488, 108 P. 284.

The order refusing to strike out the memorandum of costs is affirmed, but the order refusing to tax the costs is reversed, and the trial court is directed to make an order not inconsistent with what has been said above. The appellant will recover his costs on this appeal.

Dec. 18, 1930.

Rehearing Denied Jan. 17, 1931. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 16, 1931.

1. Bailment ⇨14(1).

Bailee of garments for hire was bound to exercise ordinary care to preserve property in same condition as when received and to return garments when bailment terminated or on demand (Civ. Code, § 1852).

2. Bailment ⇨22.

In absence of agreement regarding time during which deposit of garments should continue, it could be terminated by depositor at any time (Civ. Code, § 1854).

3. Bailment ⇨23.

It is sufficient excuse for nondelivery of property deposited as bailment that it was lost or stolen before bailment terminated without bailee's fault.

4. Bailment ⇨31(3).

Bailee's refusal to deliver chattels when bailment is terminated or on notice constitutes prima facie evidence of conversion.

5. Bailment ⇨31(1).

Failure to return property for unreasonable length of time after bailment is terminated places burden on bailee to show good cause for detention.

6. Bailment ⇨23.

Theft after termination of bailment furnishes no excuse for wrongful delay in restoring property to owner after adequate demand.

7. Bailment ⇨23.

Bailee's delay of 18 days following demand for return of garments, which were stolen after demand, constituted negligence.

Bailee was engaged in business of storing goods for hire, and bailor deposited fur garments with bailee to be kept until demand therefor. On October 17, 1924, and on three occasions thereafter prior to November 5, 1924 bailor demanded an immediate delivery of garments, and bailee promised to return the furs on October 20, 1924, but failed to do so. On November 5, 1924, an attempt was made to return them with automobile, but automobile was held up en route and furs were stolen.

8. Bailment ⇨31(3).

Evidence warranted finding that bailee's negligent delay in returning garments stolen while being returned amounted to conversion.

9. Bailment ⇨31(3).

In action for conversion of fur garments stored with bailee for hire, evidence held sufficient to show market value of furs at time of conversion.

Action by Clara L. Wolfe against Willard H. George, Inc. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

George De Lany Blair, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Steadman G. Smith, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

Mr. Justice THOMPSON delivered the opinion of the court.

This is an appeal from a judgment for the sum of $1,250 for conversion of fur garments which were stored with the appellant as a depositary for hire.

The appellant was engaged in the business of a bailee of goods for hire. The respondent owned five fur garments. June 10, 1924, these garments were deposited with the appellant for hire, to be kept for the benefit of the respondent and returned to her upon demand therefor. October 17, 1924, and upon several subsequent occasions prior to November 5, 1924, the respondent demanded an immediate delivery of the garments. The appellant promised to return the furs on October 20, 1924, but failed to do so at that time, or at all. After several demands on the part of the owner for a return of the property and a delay of eighteen days, Harold Chrisman, a young man who was employed with the appellant, attempted to return them with an automobile on November 5, 1924. He testified that the machine was held up en route and that he was robbed of the furs. He said: "I stopped at Fifth and Commonwealth to a house, delivered a coat, come back. There was two men coming down the street. Just as I was going, practically getting up to the car, one fellow said, 'I got you covered.' I didn't hear him at first, I looked and saw the gun at the time. So he told me, 'Get in the car and have a ride.' So I got in the car. The other fellow—one fellow drove, the other come around to the back seat, he put a gun to the back of my neck. We drove around from three o'clock until six. They let me out at Fourth and Commonwealth, told me to walk three blocks and not look around. Then I called the police, * * * They drove around to a vacant lot, one of the fellows got out, went back and told me to unload the furs on the curb. I unloaded the furs at the curb, waited a few minutes. He gave a signal, and there was also four men in the back. So then I drove around a couple of blocks. * * * They told me to get out and walk three blocks and then I could do as I pleased."

This story seems improbable. It will be observed that Chrisman contradicts himself. He first says, "One fellow drove, the other come around to the back seat, he put a gun to the back of my neck." Later he says, "So then I drove around a couple of blocks." It also seems strange that they started from Fifth and Commonwealth and that they "drove around from three o'clock until six," three hours, and then landed "at Fourth and Commonwealth" within a block of their starting point. However, this evidence of the robbery was not refuted. The court found that the furs were stolen. All the other material issues were found in favor of the respondent, including the fact that the furs were worth $1,250. Judgment was rendered for that amount. This appeal was then perfected.

The appellant asserts that the evidence fails to support the judgment and findings because (1) it does not appear the depositary refused to return the furs to the owner when their possession was demanded, (2) the garments were stolen through no fault or negligence on the part of the depositary, and (3) the market value of the property was not established.

[1-6] The appellant was bailee of the garments for hire. It was not an insurer of the property. Under such circumstances as the present case presents, the bailee is bound to exercise ordinary care to keep and preserve the property in the same condition in which it is received (section 1852, Civ. Code; 4 Cal. Jur. 22, § 13; England v. Lyon Fireproof Storage Co., 94 Cal. App. 562, 271 P. 532), and to return the garments to the owner when the bailment is terminated, or upon demand. In the absence of an agreement as to the length of time during which a deposit is to continue, it may be terminated by the depositor at any time. Section 1854, Civ. Code. It is a sufficient excuse for nondelivery of property deposited as a bailment that it was lost or stolen, before the bailment is terminated, without fault or negligence on the part of the bailee. 4 Cal. Jur. 22, § 13; 6 C. J. 1140, § 93. A refusal on the part of the bailee to deliver chattels to the owner when the bailment is terminated by lapse of time or upon notice constitutes prima facie evidence of a conversion thereof. 38 Cyc. 2031, subd. C. Failure to return property to the owner for an unreasonable length of time after a bailment is terminated by notice or otherwise places the burden on the bailee to show good cause for detaining the property. An unwarranted failure to return property after the termination of a bailment may constitute wrongful acts of dominion antagonistic to the owner's title and right of possession, amounting to conversion. The period of time and the circumstances under which property, which is wrongfully withheld from the owner, will constitute conversion thereof, are largely questions of fact for the determination of the court or jury. A theft of goods subsequent to the termination of a bailment furnishes no excuse for unwarranted and wrongful delay in restoring the property to the owner after adequate demand therefor.

In the case of Durell v. Mosher, 8 Johns. (N. Y.) 445, where the defendant had taken some sheep from the plaintiff's flock, supposing that they belonged to him, the defendant, but subsequently promised to return them and failed to do so, the court said: "Though a demand and refusal of the sheep was not proved; yet the promise by the defendant to return them, and a failure to do so, was evidence of a conversion."

In the case of Lay's Executor v. Lawson's Adm'r, 23 Ala. 377, a slave which was held as a bailment was not returned to the owner when the bailment terminated. The slave subsequently died while he was retained by the bailee. In a suit of trover against the bailee, the court said: "The bailment * * * terminated when the objects for which it was made were accomplished, and it then devolved upon the party in possession * * * to return the slave * * *."—Story on Bailments § 414; Benje v. Creagh's Adm'r, 21 Ala. 151. As to him, therefore, the plaintiff was entitled to recover damages."

[7, 8] In the present case, the appellant was engaged in the business of storing goods for hire. At least four specific demands for the prompt delivery of the garments were made upon the bailee by the owner. A delay of eighteen days followed the first demand before any attempt to return them was made. There was a definite promise on the part of the appellant to deliver them on October 20th. This promise was not fulfilled. No satisfactory excuse for the unwarranted delay in attempting to deliver the goods was offered by the appellant. A prompt delivery of the furs, upon demand, would probably have avoided the theft. These circumstances constitute negligence.

There is substantial evidence upon which the court was warranted in finding this negligent and wrongful delay amounted to a conversion.

[9] There is also ample evidence of the market value of the furs at the time of the conversion. Several witnesses testified to the value of such furs. There was evidence of the approximate original cost of the furs and the condition thereof. An appraisal of their value was furnished the respondent by Mr. Ayling, the secretary of the corporation appellant. It contained the following language and valuations:

"In executing this appraisal of merchandise, we use our best judgment based upon our experience and the market value at the time of appraisal * * *

1. Wills ⚡302(8).

In proceeding to have lost will admitted to probate, judgment for defendant held not error, notwithstanding plaintiff's uncontradicted testimony.

Memories of plaintiff's witnesses carried facts very accurately and for long period of time in almost same identical words, and while testimony under such circumstances must not necessarily be rejected as unworthy of belief, it must inevitably occur that trial judge will regard it with serious misgiving. Defendant's testimony showed that deceased objected to making a will, that widow never saw will and never destroyed it, and that attorney immediately after deceased's death made search for will and did not find one.

2. Wills ⚡302(8).

Lost will, not destroyed fraudulently or by public calamity during testator's lifetime, must be proved in existence at time of death and provisions proved by two witnesses (Code Civ. Proc. § 1339).

STURTEVANT, J.

[1] Henry J. Angelo commenced a proceeding to obtain a judgment admitting an alleged lost or destroyed olographic will to probate. Process was served on Anna Vetter, the surviving wife of the decedent, Frederick J. Vetter, and she appeared and answered. A trial was had before the trial court. The trial court made findings of fact in favor of the surviving wife, Anna Vetter, and, from a judgment entered thereon, the plaintiff has appealed under section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure. In his opening brief the plaintiff contends that the findings of the court are unsupported by the evidence; the findings are contrary to the evidence; the court prejudicially erred in the admission of evidence; the court prejudicially erred in excluding evidence; and the court arbitrarily found and decided contrary to evidence and law. True it is that certain declarations of the deceased were objected to by the plaintiff and that his objections were overruled. However, the plaintiff does not brief the ruling made by the trial court showing wherein any error was committed, nor that the error, if any, was prejudicial to the plaintiff. In his brief the plaintiff earnestly contends that the trial court arbitrarily disregarded the testimony given by the witnesses called by the plaintiff. In this connection the plaintiff claims there was no conflict in the evidence and that the plaintiff proved a full and complete case. In reply, the defendant contends that there was an abundance of conflict in the evidence, and furthermore she contends that the case as presented by the plaintiff failed to prove certain material issues.

Richard Spreckels, a witness called by the plaintiff, testified that in the month of May, 1915, he met the deceased in the office of an attorney at law, Charles L. Patton. He was not sure whether the plaintiff was present. He testified that at said time and place the decedent produced a paper which he handed over to the witness, and that the paper had written thereon, "I give to my friend, Henry J. Angelo, fifty thousand dollars." The witness further testified that the paper was dated. The year of the date was 1915, but he could not remember the month nor the day of the month. He did not testify whether the place of the dating was or was not on the paper. The signature on the paper was "Fred Vetter." The foregoing testimony was given by the witness in the month of June, 1928. The witness had been acquainted with the decedent some months prior to the meeting just described. Mr. Vetter died August 3, 1915. After that date and before the end of the year 1915 the witness saw the plaintiff on several occasions. At one time he asked the plaintiff if he had received his $50,000, and the plaintiff said he had not. It does not appear that he and the plaintiff had any other discussions on the subject of the will until the date of the trial. He was not sure whether the writing which he saw contained words or figures, or both, expressing the sum $50,000. There was evidence introduced that the decedent never signed his name omitting the middle initial, but wrote it "Fred J. Vetter." The witness testified that he had received letters from Mr. Vetter, but gave no testimony regarding the manner in which the decedent signed his name.

Fred J. Hildebrant testified that he knew both Mr. Vetter and the plaintiff. In the early part of 1915 the witness and the plaintiff were in a room at the residence of Mr. Angelo. Mr. Angelo went out of the room and was gone for about five minutes. While he was out, the witness testified that Mr. Vetter took out of his pocket an envelope, opened it, and took out a piece of paper on which appeared, in the handwriting of Mr. Vetter: "I leave to my friend Henry Angelo the sum of fifty thousand dollars. Fred Vetter." No explanation of any kind or nature was given by the witness why the decedent happened to exhibit the paper to him. Regarding the date, he testified, "All I can remember 1915." As to the familiarity of the witness with the writing of the decedent, he testified that about two years before that in a store in which he was employed he saw the decedent sign orders for goods. After the above occurrence, the witness remained in San Francisco about three years. Then he was out of town five years. He did not see Mr. Vetter again before the death of the latter. Before the death of the decedent, the witness did not tell Mr. Angelo what he had seen, but he testified that in 1923 he told Mr. Angelo the same thing which he testified to on the trial.

The plaintiff testified that in the fore part of 1915 the decedent showed to him a paper on which was written: "I give Henry Angelo fifty thousand dollars." This witness also stated the date as 1915, but did not remember the month nor the day of the month; neither did he state the place of the date. The document was signed "Frederick Vetter." It was all in the handwriting of the decedent. The will was so exhibited to him at the safe deposit vault. When the decedent exhibited the document, he said to the witness: "You never have to worry or want for anything any more in your old age."

The witness Beauce testified that he and the plaintiff were assistants in the tax collector's office. He recalled the death of Mr. Vetter on August 1, 1915. Several days before his death Mr. Vetter came in. The witness, the plaintiff, and Mr. Vetter were the only ones present. The witness was on one side of a desk and the plaintiff was on the other side. As the decedent came in he took an envelope from his pocket, and, speaking to Mr. Angelo, said: "Here is my will. You needn't worry the rest of your life." And, turning to the witness, he said: "Do you think fifty thousand dollars is enough for this young man?"

Adverting to the conversation in the tax collector's office, the plaintiff testified that the decedent said, "Here is my will" and handed it to me and I opened it and looked in the envelope and took it (the will?) out and said 'Fred, I don't want this. People might think I influenced you by taking it. I don't want it. Why did you take it out of the safe deposit box?'" He put it back in his pocket. It does not appear that any witness made any memoranda at any time of any of the foregoing facts.

There was oral evidence and written evidence that commencing as early as the year 1911 the plaintiff had received many gratuitous donations in the form of checks from the decedent. After the defendant took out letters of administration, this plaintiff presented to her, on June 15, 1916, a claim for $4,244.50 in which the payment was alleged to be contingent on the sale of the Market street property. The plaintiff testified that he consulted as his attorneys among others Mr. Charles L. Patton, Mr. John P. Jones, Mr. Daniel Ryan, Mr. Francis V. Keesling, Mr. Joseph Levine, and finally Messrs. Kingston and Cunningham, who commenced this proceeding by filing the petition on May 29, 1928. The record does not show that to any one of those attorneys, except Mr. Jones, who was dead at the time of the trial, and except the last two, the plaintiff ever stated the fact that the alleged will was ever in existence. It is the foregoing evidence which the plaintiff contends was uncontradicted and which the trial court should have accepted and followed. This claim assumes that the evidence was uncontradicted. Men's minds may differ. If the trial court determined that in the extreme accuracy of detail and the close agreement of the statements of the witnesses rested its weakness and was its contradiction, we could not say it erred. It is very peculiar, and quite out of the ordinary, that memories should carry so accurately and for such a long period of time almost all of the facts in almost the same identical words. While we cannot say under such circumstances it must necessarily be rejected as unworthy of belief, yet it must inevitably occur that the trial judge will regard it with serious misgivings. Turman v. Ellison, 37 Cal. App. 204, 174 P. 396. In Davis v. Judson, 159 Cal. 121, at page 128, 113 P. 147, 150, the court was considering a similar question. Among other cogent remarks the court said: " * * * And, as it is within the province of the trial court to determine what credit and weight shall be given to the testimony of any witness, this court cannot control its finding or conclusion denying the testimony credence, unless it appears that there are no matters or circumstances which at all impair its accuracy." See, also, Nichols v. Pacific Electric Ry. Co., 178 Cal. 630, 631, 632, 174 P. 319. Certainly we are not able to say as a matter of law that there were no matters or circumstances in the instant case which at all impaired the accuracy of the evidence given by the witnesses quoted above.

[2] There was no testimony that the purported will was written in San Francisco or any other particular place. There was testimony that it bore a date consisting of a statement of the year, the month, and the day of the month, but there was no evidence as to what month or what day. The purported will as described by the witnesses included a legacy to this plaintiff. The testimony does not show that it did not include other legacies or bequests, and, if so, what they were. Under a very slight variation in the facts, it was held that the proof was insufficient. Estate of Price, 14 Cal. App. 462, 112 P. 482. No claim was made that during the lifetime of the testator without his knowledge the purported will was destroyed fraudulently or by public calamity. It was therefore statutory that the will should not be proved as a lost or destroyed will unless it was proved to have been in existence at the time of the death of the testator and unless its provisions were clearly and distinctly proved by at least two credible witnesses. Code Civ. Proc. § 1339. Moreover there was testimony given in behalf of the defendant that the decedent objected to making a will because he entertained the idea that the making of a will would hasten his death. If he entertained that opinion regarding a will which would dispose of all of his property, it may readily be assumed that he entertained the same opinion regarding a will that would dispose of a part of his property. There was also the positive testimony of the defendant that she never saw the decedent's will and never destroyed it. And there was the positive statement of her attorney that immediately after the decedent's death he made a search for a will and did not find one.

We find no error in the record. The judgment is affirmed.

VANDIVEER v. CHARTERS et al.

Civ. 4219.

District Court of Appeal, Third District,
California.

Dec. 11, 1930.

1. Appeal and error ⇨1071 (3).

In action for false imprisonment and to recover money paid, finding unsupported by evidence held not essential and not to require reversal.

The court on sufficient evidence found facts showing that plaintiff was restrained of her liberty at her employer's store in connection with charges of theft and by duress compelled to acknowledge the theft and agree to make restitution by drawing money from a savings account. The court also found that by threats of arrest and intimidation, defendants compelled plaintiff to accompany one of them to her place of residence, and there by threats of arrest and intimidation and threats of use of force and violence compelled her to obtain her deposit book and to withdraw the money from the bank. There was no evidence of any restraint or imprisonment while plaintiff was going to her residence and to the bank.

2. Appeal and error ⇨989.

On conflicting evidence, appellate court merely determines whether testimony for plaintiff, successful below, is sufficient to sustain judgment.

3. False imprisonment ⇨2.

"False imprisonment" is trespass committed against another's person by unlawfully arresting or detaining him without legal authority, in prison or any place temporarily used for that purpose (Pen. Code, § 236).

Pen. Code § 236, defines "false imprisonment" as unlawful violation of personal liberty of another.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "False Imprisonment," see Words and Phrases.]

4. False imprisonment ⇨5.

Use of actual physical force is not necessary to constitute false imprisonment (Pen. Code, § 236).

5. False imprisonment ⇨39.

Whether words or conduct of defendants charged with false imprisonment were such as to induce plaintiff to apprehend use of force and coercion if she did not act in accordance with their demands held question of fact for trial court.

Plaintiff was called into stock room of her employer's store, where, after intimation that officer was present, she was accused of stealing from her employer, threatened with arrest, and given three minutes' time within which to copy and sign alleged confession, or be taken to jail.

6. False imprisonment ⇨31.

In action for false imprisonment and to recover money paid, evidence held to warrant finding that alleged confession of theft was signed under duress.

7. False imprisonment ⇨36.

$750 as exemplary and actual damages for false imprisonment held not excessive.

8. Payment ⇨87(2).

Amount paid in settlement of alleged theft of which plaintiff was falsely accused under threats of arrest was recoverable.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank C. Collier, Judge.

Action by Jessie B. Vandiveer against James W. Charters and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, the defendant named appeals.

Affirmed.

Errol O. Shour, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

D. Howard Painter and A. P. Ohanneson, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J.

The plaintiff had judgment against the defendants in the sum of $1,450 and costs of suit in an action based upon a charge of false imprisonment, $700 of said sum being for the amount of money involuntarily paid by the plaintiff to the defendants, and $750 for and on account of exemplary and actual damages. From this judgment the defendant Charters appeals.

The record shows that on the 11th day of June, 1926, the plaintiff was, and for some four or five years prior thereto had been, an employee, as clerk in the drug store owned by the defendant James W. Charters. Prior to the 11th day of June, 1926, the defendant Charters employed the defendants Condon and Johnson to check up on the clerks employed in his drug store. This work was begun on or about the 9th day of June, 1926, and was conducted for a period of two or three days. On the 11th day of June, 1926, the defendants Condon and Johnson, in the presence of the defendant Charters, took several dollar bills, money of the United States of America, and marked them with an identification mark. Thereafter, and on the same day, the operatives employed by the defendants Condon and Johnson went into the drug store referred to and made purchases of merchandise from the plaintiff, paying her for said purchases with money, a part of which consisted of the marked bills. The plaintiff did not ring up on or deposit in the cash register the entire purchase price of the purchases made, as aforesaid, but instead of doing so, placed a part of the purchase price, including the marked bills referred to, in a pocket in an apron worn by the plaintiff. Shortly thereafter the defendants Condon and Johnson reported the result of their investigation to the defendant Charters, who thereupon informed the plaintiff that Condon and Johnson desired to question her, and immediately the plaintiff and defendants Condon and Johnson went into an adjoining room, known as the stock room, in the rear of the drug store. While in said room the defendants Condon and Johnson demanded of the plaintiff that she produce from her person and give to the defendants Condon and Johnson the bills previously marked which she had failed to ring up on the cash register in the drug store heretofore mentioned. The plaintiff thereupon produced from the pocket in the apron worn by her, four of the marked dollar bills. It appears that the plaintiff and the defendants Condon and Johnson remained in the stock room for a considerable period of time, the court finding that the interview lasted about three and one-half hours, during which time the defendant Charters was in and out of the room a number of times. The plaintiff was also called out of the room once or twice to answer telephone calls. During the time the plaintiff and the defendants were in the stock room, as just mentioned, the defendants Condon and Johnson produced, and induced the plaintiff to copy and sign, a confession in the following words:

"Los Angeles, Calif., June 11, 1926.

"During the last four (4) years of my employ by J. W. Charters in his drug store located at 54th Vermont, Los Angeles, Calif., I have taken for my own use money that rightfully belong to him amounting to Twenty-two Hundred and Fifty ($2250.00) dollars. Some days I took nothing and some days I took as high as $6.00 dollars.

"I make this statement of my own free will and accord without threats or violence or promises of immunity. I promise to lead a straight-forward life in future and my failure to do so will be sufficient grounds to make this statement public.

"Jessie B. Vandiveer."

After this writing had been signed, the plaintiff, in company with the defendant Condon, went to the home of the plaintiff in an automobile driven by the defendant Condon, a distance of some 15 or 16 city blocks from the drug store, obtained a passbook, went to a bank, where the plaintiff withdrew therefrom the sum of $700, obtaining the same in the form of a cashier's check, defendant Condon remaining in the automobile outside the bank while the plaintiff entered the same for the purpose of obtaining the sum of money referred to. The plaintiff returned from the bank with a cashier's check, and being informed by Condon that the $700 was desired in the form of cash, the plaintiff returned to the bank, obtained the cash in lieu of the cashier's certificate, and returned to the automobile where the defendant Condon was waiting, and delivered to him the $700, and accompanied the defendant Condon back to the drug store where the defendant Condon turned over to the defendant Charters the $700. The plaintiff sued for the return of the money, and for damages in the sum of $12,500 for false imprisonment. The defendant Charters filed a cross-complaint, asking for the sum of $2,250, the sum mentioned in the writing signed by the plaintiff hereinbefore set forth.

Among other things, the court found as follows: That on the 11th day of June, 1926, at the drug store to which we have referred, the defendants accused the plaintiff of having committed thefts, all of which accusations were false and without merit, and were made without a prior investigation as to the merits of said accusations; and that the said defendants did, at said time and place, subject the plaintiff to a severe cross-examination commonly termed the "third degree"; and that the defendants did, at said time and place, threaten to have the plaintiff arrested and placed in prison. That the defendants, by reason of their false accusations and harsh conduct, did forcefully detain plaintiff and grossly humiliate her. That the acts, words, and conduct of the defendants, as aforesaid, continued for a period of over three hours; that at the expiration of said period the plaintiff was worn out, tired, and fatigued both mentally and physically; that by reason of the acts, words, and conduct of the defendants, as aforesaid, while the plaintiff was undergoing said cross-examination commonly termed the "third degree," and while the plaintiff was being forcefully detained and restrained by the defendants, and while the plaintiff was in a fearful and dazed condition of mind, worn and tired out, etc., she copied and signed the paper to which we have referred.

The court further found, in finding No. V, that the defendants, by means of threats of arrest and by intimidation, restrained, detained, and imprisoned plaintiff, and that the defendants did, by the exercise of threats of arrest, and intimidation, compel plaintiff to accompany the defendant Condon to plaintiff's place of residence, and then and there, by means of threats of arrest and intimidation, and by threats of the use of force and violence compel the plaintiff to obtain her deposit book; and, likewise, did compel plaintiff to withdraw the $700 from the bank, as hereinbefore stated.

[1] A portion of finding No. V is seriously challenged as being wholly unsupported by the evidence, in that it is claimed the defendant herself did not testify that any threats were made of the use of force or violence relative to compelling her to withdraw the $700 from the bank, and that the plaintiff went into her own home alone to get the passbook to withdraw the money from the bank, and also went into the bank twice, unaccompanied by any of the defendants, and that during such period of time, there was no restraint and no imprisonment. In this behalf we think the contention of the appellant well taken. While the circumstances as detailed by the plaintiff, if accepted by the trial court as being a correct statement of the occurrences, would constitute a sufficient basis upon which to enter judgment for the return of the money, there does not appear to be any basis for the allegation that during said period of time the plaintiff was either restrained or imprisoned. This, however, does not necessitate a reversal of the judgment, the portion of finding number V challenged by the appellant not being necessary for its support.

[2] A number of witnesses testified in this cause contradicting the plaintiff upon every vital issue, and as the typewritten record before us appears, the claim of the appellant that the judgment should have gone in favor of the defendants would appear to be amply sustained by the weight of the testimony. But the witnesses are not before us, and if the trial court saw fit to accept and believe the testimony of the plaintiff as against the testimony of a number of other witnesses, if that testimony is sufficient to sustain the judgment, our inquiry as to the sufficiency of the testimony is ended. For this purpose we have only to review the testimony of the plaintiff, as the record indicates the findings and judgment of the trial court are essentially based thereon.

After testifying to her employment in the drug store for a number of years, and as to seeing the defendants there on the 11th day of June, 1926, the plaintiff testified substantially as follows: "At about 11 o'clock we had quite a rush of customers, an unusual number of customers for that time in the morning; I was entirely alone in waiting on customers; I waited on these customers, and in waiting on our customers it was usual, if rushed, to lay the money on the register until we could get time to ring it up, that is, if we were alone; so I laid some money, change and bills, on the register that was near the fountain, and there was a place to walk in back of the fountain, either this way (illustrating), or down toward the back of the store; a gentleman came in who wanted to look at a shaving brush; I immediately went back to wait on him, and as I was waiting on him, I noticed a man sitting at the end of the fountain on a stool near the cash register, and I went back and picked up these bills and put them in my little black satin apron pocket; after I had sold the shaving brush, Mr. Charters came into the store and called me back; as we went back into the back room, Mr. Charters introduced me to Mr. Condon, and Mr. Condon said, 'Is there an officer here?' And just then, from behind the prescription case, Mr. Johnson stepped in and said, 'All right.' Mr. Condon said, 'I am representing the Bonding Company.' Mr. Johnson asked me about the money; he asked me to produce it; I handed him my purse; he asked me then for the bills; I told him that I hadn't had time to ring it up. Mr. Johnson said, 'Do you realize that those are marked bills?' I said, 'What do you mean, marked bills?' Johnson said, 'It means you have been stealing from Mr. Charters.' After I had handed Condon my coin purse, Condon said, 'Have you any more money?' He looked over the coin purse very carefully * * * and handed it back, saying, 'This is all right;' I dropped it down in the front of my dress; then Condon said, 'Have you any more money on your person?' and I said, 'No, sir.' He said, 'Do you want me to search you?' and I said, 'No, sir.' 'You know,' said Condon, 'the other day I practically undressed a woman that did not want to be searched.' Condon said it would not do for me to take a couple of bills. Up to this time Condon had not made any remark about money. Mr. Condon said that I had taken things off the shelves at various times and taken them home, and he also asked me how many times I had deliberately opened the register drawers and taken out money; I told him I had never done anything of the kind; Mr. Condon kept telling me that I had been doing these things; then Condon asked me if I had any money in the bank or any property, and I told Mr. Condon that I thought that was my business; Mr. Condon questioned me a great many times, and I wouldn't tell him; he got very angry and walked out of the room; threw a note book that he had in his hand and struck me in the side; walked out of the room and stayed there a few minutes and left me in the room with Mr. Johnson; Mr. Condon came back in and I begged him to bring Mr. Charters so that I could talk with Charters; Condon would go back in the room and come back and say that Charters was busy; Condon kept telling me that I had been doing these things; finally I told Condon and Johnson that I had $700.00 in a savings account that had been given to me Christmas by Mr. Vandiveer, $485.00 of which was my mother's money which she had received at Christmas; they said, 'You have stolen that from Mr. Charters, and you know you have.' I told them I had canceled checks to show for this money. Mr. Condon finally went out and called Mr. Charters in, and they said, 'Well, what do you think about $2500.00?' I went out and answered the telephone once; I told them that I had never taken anything, and that the money I had in the bank was my money. Finally

Mr. Charters said, 'Make it $2500.00.' Mr. Condon went outside and then returned and said, 'I will give you just three minutes now to copy and sign this confession, or I am going to take you to jail. Do you want to go to jail?' I said I couldn't think of anything like that; I have no reason to be taken to jail; I have a mother and two children. Condon said, 'We don't care anything about your mother and two children. You either copy and sign this, or we are going to take you with us.' They gave me a couple of boxes the same height, and rather than being taken to jail, I copied and signed the confession; I sat on one box and used the other in copying the confession; I thought they were plain-clothes men, and Condon told me if I didn't sign the confession within three minutes, I would be taken.' After the writing was signed by the plaintiff, the plaintiff accompanied Mr. Condon to the bank for the cash, as we have heretofore stated.

The plaintiff further testified that she thought Condon and Johnson were plain-clothes men. "Condon told me that he was working for the higher-ups; that he was just a representative of the Bonding Company, and that I must pay this $700 or they were going to take me up; that they were going to take me to jail; they said this a dozen or more times; they kept repeating that to me, that they were going to take me, and Mr. Condon said he had other places to go, and that if I didn't do it, they were certainly going to take me right away, if I didn't tell them what I had taken and what I had done at different times after accusing me of taking money out of the registers. Every five or ten minutes they would come back and say, 'How many times have you opened the cash register and deliberately taken money out that belonged, rightfully, to Mr. Charters?'" Asked as to whether she had made any request to be permitted to go out of the room, the plaintiff answered, "No, I didn't attempt to go out of the room while I was in there; naturally, when there was an officer of the law I didn't think I could if I tried, and I was afraid of being taken out, and that is what I was trying to avoid." Neither Condon nor Johnson were, in fact, officers of the law, but the inference could very well be drawn from the testimony of the plaintiff that language was used by Condon and Johnson to give the plaintiff the impression that one or the other of them was an officer authorized to make arrests. This testimony is all flatly contradicted, but there is no contradiction that the interview lasted approximately three and one-half hours; that during that period of time the plaintiff signed the writing set forth in this opinion, and thereafter accompanied Condon to the bank, procured the $700, which finally found its way into the possession of the defendant Charters. Upon this testimony and the recital of other incidental facts not necessary to be set forth herein, the court found that the plaintiff signed the confession under duress, paid over the money involuntarily, and was, at least for a portion of the time, restrained of her liberty through threats of being arrested, with the apparent show of force of the two men there ready to take the plaintiff to jail.

[3, 4] On the part of the appellant it is seriously contended that sufficient facts are not shown to warrant a finding of false imprisonment and judgment thereon. Section 236 of the Penal Code reads: "False imprisonment is the unlawful violation of the personal liberty of another." This does not necessarily mean that one shall actually be confined within the walls of a prison. It is a trespass committed by one against the person of another by unlawfully arresting him or detaining him without legal authority, either in prison or in any place temporarily used for the purpose of restraining and detaining such person. Nor is it necessary that there should be any actual physical force used to constitute the imprisonment. In 11 Ruling Case Law, p. 793, we find the following: "In order to constitute false imprisonment it is essential that there should be some direct restraint of the person; but to constitute 'imprisonment,' in the sense in which the word is here used, it is not necessary that there should be confinement in a jail or prison. Any exercise of force, or express or implied threat of force, by which in fact the other person is deprived of his liberty, compelled to remain where he does not wish to go, or to go where he does not wish to go, is an imprisonment. * * * While actual force is not necessary, it is generally held essential that the conduct of the person complained of must show that force will be used to detain the plaintiff, if necessary, or that the person detaining him does so by some legal authority. The essential thing is the restraint of the person. This may be caused by threats, as well as by actual force; and the threats may be by conduct or by words. If the words or conduct are such as to induce a reasonable apprehension of force, and the means of coercion are at hand, a person may be as effectually restrained and deprived of liberty as by prison bars."

[5] It was a question of fact for the trial court to determine whether the words "or conduct," of Condon and Johnson, were such as to induce the plaintiff, as a reasonable person, to apprehend the use of force and coercion, if she declined to act in accordance with their demands. According to the testimony of the plaintiff she was asked to go into the stockroom to be questioned. That she may have gone in there voluntarily does not change the fact that she was immediately confronted with an intimation that an officer was near. Thereafter, during the interview she was accused of stealing and threatened with arrest, and given three minutes' time within which to copy and sign the alleged confession. During that three minutes of time she was effectually restrained and detained, as though she had been behind prison bars. The threat was to take her to jail at the end of three minutes, and the two men were there to take her. This, of course, is based upon giving full credence to the testimony of the plaintiff. To do so was within the province of the trial court.

[6] In 25 C. J. p. 454, § XI, the rule as to apprehension of force is thus stated: "The restraint constituting false imprisonment may arise out of acts, words, gestures or the like, which induce a reasonable apprehension that force will be used if the plaintiff does not submit, and it is sufficient if they operate upon the will of the person threatened, and result in the reasonable fear of personal difficulties or personal injuries. * * * A voluntary display of force, intended to deprive plaintiff of his liberty, even without actual laying hands on plaintiff, has been held sufficient, but there is no legal wrong unless the detention was involuntary in the sense of being contrary to the will of the plaintiff." The facts and circumstances set forth in the record are sufficient, if accepted by the trial court as true, to show that the signing of the alleged confession was entirely involuntary, and that the plaintiff copied and signed the instrument involuntarily, and while so doing was acting under the implied threat that at the end of the time specified, if she did not comply with the demands of the defendants, she would be taken to jail.

In the notes to the case of Whitman v. A. T. & S. F. Ry. Co., collected in Ann. Cas. 1912D, pages 722 and 731, we find the following: "The question of false imprisonment is a mixed question of law and fact. It is a question of law for the court to decide what facts will constitute a false imprisonment; and a question of fact for the jury, whether such a state of facts does exist as is necessary to make out an imprisonment under the law as settled by the court." (Citing a number of cases.) Thus, in the present case it was necessary for the plaintiff to show that for an appreciable length of time she was detained and restrained of her liberty. This may be done either by threats of the use of force—there being present the means of using such force—or by the actual use of force. It was the province of the trial court to determine if such circumstances existed in the present case. We think the testimony sufficient to warrant the trial court in so finding, if the trial court felt justified in accepting the plaintiff's version of what took place in the stockroom in the rear of the drug store owned and operated by the defendant Charters.

In the case of Fleisher v. Enslinger, 140 Md. 604, 118 A. 153, referred to in the notes 31 A. L. R. 315, we find a state of facts very similar to those characterizing the instant case, and held sufficient to uphold the finding of false imprisonment. We quote the following: "It appeared that the plaintiff, a saleswoman in the defendant's store, had sold an article and had dropped the money paid therefor, 20 cents, into her apron pocket, intending, so she said, to ring it up on the cash register as soon as she had finished showing goods to a customer who was waiting. Before she did so, however, she was summoned to the defendant's office, whither she was accompanied by another employee, and where, so she alleged, she was charged by the defendant with stealing money and articles, abused, and ordered to bring her pocketbook from the locker room, which she did while accompanied by an employee at the defendant's direction. She testified also that the defendant told her that he could have her arrested and that she feared such action. The court declared that any deprivation of another's liberty without his consent, by violence, threats, or otherwise, when done unlawfully, constituted false imprisonment, and that it could not be said that there was no evidence in this case to go to the jury." It was further said: "The plaintiff's willingness to comply with the defendant's orders would not, it was held, defeat recovery by the former if such willingness was induced by fear of arrest or force." To the same effect is the case of Whitman v. A. T. & S. F. Ry. Co., supra, also reported in 85 Kan. 150, 116 P. 234, 34 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1029. See, also, Hebrew v. Pulis, 73 N. J. Law, 621, 64 A. 121, 7 L. R. A. (N. S.) 580, 118 Am. St. Rep. 716, and the cases there cited.

[7, 8] The amount of damages awarded is not excessive, and under the facts found by the trial court, the plaintiff was entitled to judgment for the return of the $700 paid by her to the defendants, and also entitled to a judgment that the defendant Charters take nothing by reason of his cross-complaint; the testimony of the plaintiff being sufficient to sustain the finding in favor of the plaintiff with regard to these questions.

The judgment is affirmed.

All concur.

FISHER v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR LOS ANGELES COUNTY et al.

Civ. 7628.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 2, California.

Dec. 19, 1930.

I. Divorce ☞160.

Default divorce judgment, void for plaintiff's fraud in preventing defendant from having fair trial, is regarded by equity court as not rendered.

2. Divorce ☞161.

In wife's proceeding to set aside interlocutory divorce decree for fraud, and secure separate maintenance, court has same jurisdiction as though decree had not been rendered.

Application by Roy Fisher for a writ of prohibition to prevent the Superior Court of Los Angeles County from proceeding to punish petitioner and prevent it from hearing the order to show cause why he should not be punished for contempt.

Writ denied.

See, also, 294 P. 446.

Hancock & Rogers, of Huntington Park, for petitioner.

Everett W. Mattoon, Co. Counsel, and S. V. O. Prichard, Deputy Co. Counsel, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

IRA F. THOMPSON, J.

On July 5, 1929, the petitioner here commenced an action in the respondent court against his wife for divorce. After default of the defendant and trial, and on August 1, 1929, an interlocutory decree was made and rendered. On August 2, 1930, the defendant in the divorce action filed a complaint for separate maintenance on the grounds of desertion, willful neglect, and extreme cruelty, and also set up a cause of action to set aside and vacate the interlocutory decree, for the reason that it was obtained by the plaintiff there through extrinsic fraud practiced upon the court and the defendant. On August 22, 1930, the respondent court made an order requiring the petitioner here to pay to the plaintiff in the second action, during the pendency of the action, certain sums of money for the support of herself and their minor children and also the sum of $75 as attorneys' fees therein. Later an order was made requiring the petitioner to appear and show cause why he should not be punished for contempt for refusal to comply with this order. It is for the purpose of preventing the respondent court from proceeding to punish the petitioner and to prevent it from hearing the order to show cause that the writ of prohibition is sought in the matter now before us.

[1, 2] In Parsons v. Weis, 144 Cal. 410, 77 P. 1007, 1010, which was an action to set aside a judgment quieting title on the ground that it was fraudulently obtained and to have it declared that plaintiff was in fact the owner of the property, it is said: "An attack upon a judgment on the ground that it was procured by fraud is a direct attack, since the establishment of the fraud shows that no judgment has been rendered. The fraud, however, from which said relief may be given, does not include a judgment regularly obtained upon a fraudulent claim or by false testimony, but it is limited to a fraud in procuring the judgment. Pico v. Cohn, 91 Cal. 129, 25 P. 970, 27 P. 537, 13 L. R. A. 336, 25 Am. St. Rep. 159." (Italics ours.) An examination of a leading case upon the subject, United States v. Throckmorton, 98 U. S. 61, 64, 25 L. Ed. 93, discloses that in those cases where an attack upon a judgment is to be sustained on account of the character of the fraud employed the courts proceed upon "the general doctrine that fraud vitiates the most solemn contracts, documents, and even judgments." Assuming for the moment that petitioner here was guilty of fraud designed, intended, and which actually resulted in preventing the defendant from having a fair trial of the divorce action, and that the judgment rendered against her by reason thereof was unjust and unconscionable, it is obvious that in the eyes of a court of equity it is as though no judgment had ever been rendered. In the proceeding to set aside the judgment on the grounds mentioned and to secure separate maintenance, the court is clothed with the same jurisdiction as though no decree had been rendered. It becomes a matter of fact for the court to determine, in the exercise of a sound judicial discretion, whether the petitioner was guilty of perpetrating the kind of fraud which authorizes the judgment to be declared void and of no effect.

Divorce ⇨156.

Court properly refused final divorce decree during pendency of wife's action to set aside interlocutory decree for fraud.

Application by Roy Fisher for a writ of mandate compelling the Superior Court of Los Angeles County to enter final decree in divorce action.

Writ denied.

This is a companion case to Fisher v. Superior Court, 294 P. 445, this day decided. In this proceeding the petitioner seeks the writ of mandate compelling the respondent court to enter the final decree in the divorce action, which he alleges he demanded of that court after the expiration of one year from the date the interlocutory decree was entered. In addition to the authorities relied upon in the opinion in that case, we quote from Dunlap v. Steere, 92 Cal. 344, 28 P. 563, 16 L. R. A. 361, 27 Am. St. Rep. 143, as follows: "In general, it may be stated that in all cases where, by accident or mistake or fraud or otherwise, a party has an unfair advantage in proceedings in a court of law, which must necessarily make that court an instrument of injustice, and it is therefore against conscience that he should use that advantage, a court of equity will interfere, and restrain him from using the advantage which he has thus improperly gained." Story, Eq. Jur. § 885." It having been made to appear by a complaint filed in the respondent court that such a situation may exist with respect to this judgment, it was the plain duty of the court to refuse to enter the final decree.

Writ denied.

STOUT v. GILL et al.
Civ. 508.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District,
California.

Dec. 15, 1930.

Rehearing Denied Jan. 12, 1931. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 9, 1931.

1. Acknowledgment ⇨52.

Presumption arising from certificate of notary public before whom deed was acknowledged is some evidence of execution.

2. Deeds ⇨207.

In action to quiet title, evidence established that plaintiff executed deeds to property and that same were not forgeries.

While plaintiff denied having signed deeds in question, they contained usual certificates of acknowledgment before notary public. Grantee, who was former husband of plaintiff, testified that plaintiff signed deeds, and gave surrounding circumstances with some particularity. Wife of notary public corroborated grantee's testimony.

3. Divorce ⇨254.

Divorce decree adjudging ownership of property held not judgment against specific realty, and therefore not conclusive upon defendant's successor in interest taking without notice (Code Civ. Proc. § 1908).

4. Vendor and purchaser ⇨239(1).

Bona fide purchaser for value without notice is entitled to protection against undisclosed rights and titles.

5. Vendor and purchaser ⇨231(9).

Rule that, where person holds title to unoccupied land by unrecorded contract or deed, bona fide purchaser for value from apparent record owner takes free from undisclosed title applies to person claiming such a title through decree of court obtained in county where land is not situated.

6. Divorce ⇨254.

Wife, adjudged separate owner of realty in divorce decree, held estopped from disputing title of bona fide purchaser from husband as record owner, absent constructive notice of pending divorce suit (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 674, 1908; Civ. Code, §§ 1158, 1159, 1169).

Husband before and pending divorce suit was separate and record owner of property in controversy. Wife allowed record of ownership in husband to remain so for nearly two years after interlocutory judgment of divorce and for nearly year after entry of final judgment. No effort was made to give constructive notice of pendency of divorce suit.

7. Divorce ⇨254.

Divorce decree adjudging certain realty separate property of wife, not recorded where land was situated, could not affect rights of bona fide purchaser from husband as record owner (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 674, 1908; Civ. Code, §§ 1158, 1159, 1169).

BARNARD, J.

This is an action to quiet title to certain real property in San Bernardino county. From the evidence introduced, the following facts appear: The defendant Stout and the plaintiff were formerly husband and wife. They had acquired the real property involved in this action, together with certain other real property situated in Los Angeles county. On April 19, 1922, Stout conveyed the San Bernardino property to his wife by quitclaim deed. On February 6, 1924, Stout and his wife, the plaintiff herein, joined in another quitclaim deed, conveying the same premises to the plaintiff; the deed stating that it was given and accepted for the express purpose of vesting title in the wife, as her separate property. On March 12, 1925, as a part of a property settlement, the defendant Stout agreed to give to the plaintiff the real property in Los Angeles county, and the plaintiff executed and delivered to Stout a grant deed conveying to him the San Bernardino property, which deed contained the following clause: "This Deed is given to carry out the mutual agreement of the parties hereto that said property shall become vested in the Grantee, as the Grantee's sole and separate property free from all interest, title or claim of Grantor now existing or which may hereafter arise by reason of the marital relation of said parties, and is so accepted by said Grantor."

On March 23, 1925, the plaintiff executed and delivered a quitclaim deed to the defendant Stout, covering the same property in San Bernardino county. On April 1, 1925, Stout filed a suit in the county of Los Angeles, asking for a divorce from the plaintiff herein. On April 13, 1925, Stout conveyed his interest in the Los Angeles property to his wife. On January 26, 1926, an interlocutory decree of divorce in the action above referred to, was entered in the superior court of Los Angeles county, in favor of the wife, upon her cross-complaint. On October 20, 1927, Alexander M. Stout conveyed the San Bernardino property to J. B. Gill, one of the defendants herein. This deed was recorded in San Bernardino county on October 22, 1927, and the other deeds referred to, covering the same property, had all been recorded in that county within a few days after their execution. Nothing was recorded in San Bernardino county having any reference to the divorce proceeding or to any decree entered in that action in the superior court of Los Angeles county. Defendant J. B. Gill purchased the San Bernardino property for its actual value and without notice of the claims of the plaintiff. Among other things, the trial court found that on March 12, 1925, the plaintiff and her husband made, executed, and delivered to the said husband, for a valuable consideration, a deed whereby the real property in question was conveyed to the husband; that on March 23, 1925, for a valuable consideration, the plaintiff made, executed, and delivered to her husband, a quitclaim deed covering the same property; and that ever since October 20, 1927, the said real property has been and still is the community property of the defendants J. B. Gill and Thelma Gill. From the judgment that followed, the plaintiff has appealed.

[1, 2] It is first contended by appellant that the findings just referred to are not supported by the evidence; it being insisted that the deeds of March 12, 1925, and March 23, 1925, respectively, were forgeries, that they were never signed by plaintiff, and that they conveyed no title. Upon this point, it is significant that the record shows that no real attack was made upon the genuineness of the appellant's signature to these instruments. While the appellant denied having signed the instruments, the record shows none of the usual efforts to prove that the purported signatures were not hers. On the other hand, the instruments contained the usual certificates of acknowledgment before a notary public; her ex-husband testified that she signed the deeds, giving the circumstances with some particularity; and the wife of the notary public corroborated the husband's testimony as to appellant's acknowledgment of the deed dated March 12, 1925. Appellant insists that the record shows that the quitclaim deed of March 23, 1925, was not acknowledged by her. While that is not important, the presumption arising from the notary's certificate was some evidence, and the only other evidence appearing is the statement of appellant that she did not acknowledge it, and the statement of the husband that he did not know whether she did or not. While appellant sets forth a number of circumstances upon which she relies as showing that it was improbable that she signed the two deeds in question, these create no more than a conflict in the evidence, at best, and the findings attacked are not only supported by the evidence, but, we think, by a preponderance thereof.

The only other point raised is that the judgment and findings of fact are contrary to law, in that the trial court failed and refused to give any effect whatsoever to the judgment of the superior court of Los Angeles county. A certified copy of the findings of fact and interlocutory decree dated January 26, 1926, in the divorce action in Los Angeles county, and of the final decree therein dated January 31, 1927, were introduced in evidence, from which it appears that the court found the property involved in this action to be the sole and separate property of the appellant herein. Appellant contends that, irrespective of anything shown by the official records of San Bernardino county as to the title to this property, the judgment of the superior court of Los Angeles county is absolutely conclusive and final, to the effect that Alexander M. Stout had no title in the property here involved, and therefore could convey none of the respondent Gill. In support thereof, appellant cites Allen v. Allen, 159 Cal. 197, 113 P. 160; Fannie Briggs Carr v. Carr Company, a corporation, 39 Cal. App. 53, 177 P. 856; Scarpa v. Scarpa, 40 Cal. App. 345, 180 P. 637; Huneke v. Huneke, 12 Cal. App. 199, 107 P. 131; Abbott v. Superior Court, 69 Cal. App. 660, 232 P. 154; and Barrow v. Barrow, 42 Cal. App. 50, 183 P. 364.

That the decree in the divorce action in Los Angeles county was conclusive between the parties thereto may be conceded, but we are here considering the rights of an innocent purchaser of land situated in another county for value and without notice, either actual or constructive. Section 1908 of the Code of Civil Procedure reads in part as follows:

"The effect of a judgment or final order in an action or special proceeding before a court or judge of this state, or of the United States, having jurisdiction to pronounce the judgment or order, is as follows:

"1. In a case of a judgment or order against a specific thing, * * * the judgment or order is conclusive upon the title to the thing. * * *

"2. In other cases, the judgment or order is, in respect to the matter directly adjudged, conclusive between the parties and their successors in interest by title subsequent to the commencement of the action or special proceeding, litigating for the same thing under the same title and in the same capacity, provided they have notice, actual or constructive, of the pendency of the action or proceeding."

[3, 4] This decree of divorce was not a judgment or order against this specific real property, and, under the terms of the section, this judgment is conclusive upon a successor in interest of one of the parties, only in the event he had notice, actual or constructive. No such notice here appears. Ample provision is made in our Codes to enable a person securing such a judgment to give constructive notice thereof in any county where real property covered thereby may be situated. Code Civ. Proc. § 674; Civ. Code, §§ 1158, 1159, and 1169. A bona fide purchaser of real estate for value and without notice is entitled to protection against undisclosed rights and titles. 25 Cal. Jur. 820, and cases cited. In Bernhard v. Wall, 184 Cal. 625, 194 P. 1040, 1046, the court says: "The rule is well settled that where land is unoccupied and a person holds title thereto by a contract or deed which is not recorded, and a third person in ignorance thereof, in good faith and for value, buys the land from the apparent record owner thereof, he takes the title free from the prior, but undisclosed and unrecorded title of the other party."

[5-7] The same rule applies to a person claiming such a title through a decree of court, obtained in a county where the land is not situated. Not only did these respondents have no notice of the proceedings in Los Angeles county, but the records in San Bernardino county, upon which they relied, not only showed the title of the property to be in appellant's former husband, but also affirmatively showed that such title had been conveyed to him by the appellant, free from any of her marital rights. Although appellant had every opportunity to protect her own interests, she not only placed the title to the property in her husband's name, but allowed the record thereof in San Bernardino county to remain in that condition for nearly two years after the interlocutory judgment was entered in Los Angeles county, and for nearly a year after the entry of final judgment, before respondents purchased the land. The fact that respondents bought the land in reliance upon the record title is due to the laches of appellant herself, rather than to any negligence upon the part of respondents. By thus holding her former husband out as the owner of the land, the appellant is estopped from disputing the validity of the title conveyed by him to respondents. Schumacher v. Truman, 134 Cal. 430, 66 P. 591. The decree of the superior court of Los Angeles county in the divorce action referred to, not having been recorded in the county of San Bernardino, had no effect upon the rights of the respondents, who had no actual knowledge thereof.

The judgment is affirmed.

This is a companion case to Stout v. Gill, 294 P. 446, this day decided. In that action it was contended that certain deeds were forged and not acknowledged by the grantor. This is an action for damages brought against the notary public who had attached certificates of acknowledgment to those deeds, and against his surety, based upon the theory that said certificates of acknowledgment were false. The two cases were tried at the same time, and the court, having found, in the case of Stout v. Gill, that the deeds involved were genuine, entered judgment in favor of the defendants in this action. The plaintiffs have appealed, and the parties have stipulated that the decision herein shall correspond to the decision in the other case.

The judgment in Stout v. Gill, having been affirmed, the judgment here appealed from is also affirmed.

WINSTANLEY v. ACKERMAN.

Civ. 427.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District
California.

Dec. 24, 1930.

Rehearing and Motion for Supplemental Findings of Fact Denied Jan. 15, 1931.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 19, 1931.

1. Release ⇨23, 24(2).

Notwithstanding release was procured by fraud, plaintiff was bound thereby, in absence of rescission, or tender of amount received (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 448, 462; Civ. Code, §§ 1566, 1691).

Plaintiff sued for death of husband allegedly caused by defendant's negligent driving of automobile. Defendant pleaded release, and court, after finding for plaintiff on issue of negligence, found that release was void because procured by fraud. Amount paid in consideration of release was credited on total damages, and judgment entered for remainder. Plaintiff did not file affidavit denying execution of release as authorized by Code Civ. Proc. § 448. Civ. Code, §§ 1566, 1691, specify requirements for rescission, one of which is that offer must be made to return everything of value received.

2. Pleading ⇨291(2).

Plaintiff, although not filing statutory affidavit denying execution of release, could, without further pleading, offer any legitimate defense, except want of genuineness or execution (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 448, 462).

3. Appeal and error ☞931(1).

Every intendment will be indulged to sustain trial court's fact finding, especially where appeal is taken on judgment roll alone.

4. Judgment ☞200.

Trial court's finding that release executed by plaintiff was void held not to sustain judgment for plaintiff (Civ. Code, §§ 38, 1541, 1566, 1691).

Finding did not support judgment for plaintiff, because it was expressly found that release was void because it was procured by defendant by fraud, deceit, and by undue influence, without finding that plaintiff was then so devoid of understanding as to render her contract of release a nullity under Civ. Code, § 38, providing that person entirely without understanding has no power to make contract of any kind.

5. Release ☞15.

Nervousness and neurasthenia do not constitute "mental incompetency" avoiding release ab initio, although transaction may be avoided by timely rescission and tender (Civ. Code, §§ 38, 1541, 1566, 1691).

Civ. Code, § 1541, provides that written release, with or without new consideration, extinguishes obligation, but section 38 provides that person entirely without understanding has no power to make contract of any kind.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; S. M. Marsh, Judge.

Action by Arline Ruth Winstanley against Morris Ackerman. Defendant by supplemental answer pleaded a release, and, from a judgment for plaintiff, avoiding the release on the ground of fraud, defendant appeals.

Reversed, and remanded for new trial.

Superseding opinion in 291 P. 273.

George L. Greer, of Los Angeles, and Titus & Macomber, of San Diego, for appellant.

AMES, Justice pro tem.

The plaintiff in this action is the surviving wife of Joseph Vincent Alexander Winstanley, deceased. She instituted this action for the recovery of damages for his death, alleged to have been caused by the negligent and careless driving of an automobile by defendant. In his answer the defendant denied negligence and pleaded contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff. After the case was at issue, the defendant, by leave of the court, filed a supplemental answer in which it was alleged that, since the filing of the original answer, plaintiff and defendant had made and entered into an accord and satisfaction, fully and finally settling and satisfying any and all claims of the plaintiff against defendant. A copy of this release is attached to the supplemental answer as an exhibit thereto. In said release it is recited that, in consideration of the sum of $1,250, plaintiff released and discharged defendant of, and from, any and all claims on account of, and arising out of, the accident on which the claim for damage is based. The case was tried before the court without a jury, and, on the issues of negligence and contributory negligence, the court found in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant. On the issue tendered by the allegations in the supplemental answer, the court found that said release had been executed, and that defendant had paid to the plaintiff the said sum of $1,250, but that said accord and satisfaction was null and void and of no effect, for the reason that the same was procured by the defendant by fraud and deceit and undue influence practiced upon the plaintiff by the representatives of the defendant.

The court further found that, at a time prior to the accident which resulted in the death of plaintiff's husband, an agent of the Pacific Indemnity Company had written a policy of insurance for the protection of the defendant against financial loss in any accident occurring through his negligent driving of an automobile; that on the 10th day of February, 1928, and after the filing of the original answer in said action, an agent of the Pacific Indemnity Company took the plaintiff to the office of the attorney for the defendant; that she was then and there importuned to settle her claim against the defendant for $1,000; that plaintiff and said agent of the Pacific Indemnity Company were directed by said attorney to the office of an agent and representative of said company, where plaintiff was again importuned and urged to settle her claim for $1,000; this she declined to do; that thereafter, and on or about the 14th day of February, 1928, the agent of the indemnity company again called upon the plaintiff, and, by means of false and fraudulent representations made to her, induced her to accept the sum of $1,250 as a final settlement of her claim.

The court further found that the plaintiff had explained to the agents' servants, representatives, and attorneys of the defendant that she was poor and destitute; that they were well aware of said facts; that the plaintiff was nervous and neurasthenic, and that they then and there practiced undue influence upon her, in this, that they took an unfair advantage of her weakness of mind, and in that they took a grossly oppressive and unfair advantage of her necessities and distress; that, in her reliance upon the truth of these representations, plaintiff accepted the sum of $1,250 and executed the accord and satisfaction as aforesaid.

The court further found that by reason of the death of her husband plaintiff had been damaged in the sum of $7,500, and crediting that amount with the sum of $1,250 which had been paid her on said settlement, entered its judgment for the balance of $6,250. From this judgment defendant appeals upon the judgment roll alone.

[1, 2] The principal point relied upon by the appellant, and which we think is controlling, is that there is no finding of any offer of payment, or tender of a return of the said sum of $1,250 to the defendant, or any finding of a rescission of said accord and satisfaction. It is true that there is no such finding in the record, nor does the record disclose any offer of rescission or tender of benefits of said contract at the trial of said action. After the filing of the supplemental answer, the plaintiff did not file an affidavit denying the execution of the said agreement as provided in section 448 of the Code of Civil Procedure. And, having failed to deny its execution, it was open to plaintiff, without further pleading, to introduce evidence to sustain any legitimate defense thereto except want of genuineness or due execution. Code Civ. Proc. § 462; Baird v. Pacific Electric Co., 39 Cal. App. 512, 179 P. 449, 451; Garcia v. California Truck Co., 183 Cal. 767, 192 P. 708, 710. "An obligation is extinguished by a release therefrom given to the debtor by the creditor, upon a new consideration, or in writing, with or without a new consideration." Civ. Code, § 1541. But any rights asserted under such release are subject to the equitable defense of fraud, misrepresentation, or undue influence. Section 1566 of the Civil Code is as follows: "A consent which is not free is nevertheless not absolutely void, but may be rescinded by the parties, in the manner prescribed by the chapter on rescission."

Section 1691 of the Civil Code prescribes that the rescission of a contract when not affected by consent can be accomplished only by the use, on the part of the party rescinding, of reasonable diligence to comply with certain specified rules, one of which is that "he must restore to the other party everything of value which he has received from him under the contract; or must offer to restore the same," etc. The record in this case does not disclose that such tender was made.

In the case of Garcia v. California Truck Co., supra, the facts were similar to the case at bar, and the question before the court was as to the necessity of a tender of the amount of money which had been paid to plaintiff in consideration of the execution of a release. In that case the court quoted with approval from Fox v. Hudson, 150 Ky. 115, 150 S. W. 49, Ann. Cas. 1914A, 832, as follows: "Where the claim is for unliquidated damages, or when the settlement is made to adjust a matter in dispute, or where there is a controversy as to the amount owing, and the parties agree upon a sum that shall be paid in settlement, the amount so paid must be returned, if the party settled with seeks to avoid the settlement on the ground of fraud. But when there is no dispute as to the sum due, and the creditor is induced by fraud to accept a less amount than his whole debt, he may attack the settlement without returning what he has received."

And further in this case, at page 771 of 183 Cal., 192 P. 708, 710, the court said: "As stated in the case of Kley v. Healy, 127 N. Y. 555, 561, 28 N. E. 593, 595, cited approvingly in Matteson v. Wagoner, supra [147 Cal. 739, 82 P. 436], the rule is as follows: 'A more satisfactory answer, however, may be found in the principle that one who attempts to rescind a transaction on the ground of fraud is not required to restore that which in any event he would be entitled to retain either by virtue of the contract sought to be set aside, or the original liability.'"

In the instant case, at the time of the execution of the release, defendant had filed an answer denying his liability, and that issue was wholly undetermined, and the amount of such liability, if any, was necessarily unliquidated. And, while a creditor is not required to restore that which in any event he would be entitled to retain, it cannot be said that the plaintiff in this case had retained only that which, without dispute, belonged to her. The court in the case last cited distinguishes between that case and Meyer v. Haas, 126 Cal. 560, 58 P. 1042, 1043, cited by respondent herein, where the plaintiff was induced to execute, for $25, a release of all claims on account of his injuries, having been induced by fraud to believe that he was discharging only such claim as he might have had for loss of time. But the plaintiff, it was said, was "not attempting to avoid a contract which he had made, but is showing that he did not make the contract which he apparently had made." The written contract was held void ab initio, because the release which was actually executed was not the release that the plaintiff intended to execute.

The cases cited by respondent are not in point. In Rued v. Cooper, 119 Cal. 463, 51 P. 704, the plaintiff, as assignee of an insolvent debtor, sued to recover money which had been paid by said debtor under a void contract for the purchase and sale of stock on margin, and judgment for the defendant was reversed for the reason that there was no proof of any agreement to settle a claim for the money illegally paid, or that the illegality of such claim was even known to or considered by the parties in any manner in executing the release involved in that case.

The case of Richards v. Fraser, 122 Cal. 456, 55 P. 246, 247, was an action to recover money fraudulently obtained from plaintiff by defendants, some of whom had been his co-partners. The defendants pleaded a release, but it was held that an offer to rescind and restore the consideration for the release was unnecessary because, under the facts, the plaintiff would in any event have been entitled to retain such consideration. Quoting with approval from Gilson, etc., Co. v. Gilson, 47 Cal. 597, the court said: "One who attempts to rescind a transaction on the ground of fraud is not required to restore that which, in any event, he would be entitled to retain."

In Baird v. Pacific Electric Co., supra, a judgment of the superior court was reversed because the court refused to permit the plaintiff to introduce any evidence, for the reason that release from liability had been pleaded by the defendant, the execution and genuineness of which had not been denied. The superior court apparently assumed that plaintiff was relying upon some defense which he could not be permitted to maintain without first tendering back to the defendant the money he had received in consideration of such settlement. But the appellate court could find nothing in the record to justify such assumption. The court said: "If his evidence would have disclosed a total incompetency to enter into a settlement, and a continuing and permanent disability in that respect, these releases became mere 'scraps of paper' (Civ. Code, § 38); and it is well settled that no obligation to repay money advanced on the settlement as a condition of controverting the agreements would exist. Or, even if the disability was only partial and temporary, and it should be shown in evidence that the settlement was obtained by fraud and deceit as to the contents of the agreements and their legal effect, or again, if a state of facts existed where, in his weakened mental state, the plaintiff was induced by fraudulent representations to sign these releases, in the belief that he was being paid so much on account, he could not be required to tender back the payments as a condition of offering evidence to defeat the agreed settlement."

[3, 4] In her petition for a rehearing, respondent contends that it was sufficient that the findings were to the effect that the release was void, and it is suggested that, for the purpose of affirming the judgment, the court should assume that evidence introduced at the trial was sufficient to support the finding that the accord and satisfaction was null and void. And while it is true that every intentment will be indulged to sustain a finding of fact, especially in cases where the appeal has been taken upon the judgment roll alone, in the instant case the trial court expressly found that "said accord and satisfaction was null and void and of no effect for the reason that the same was procured by the defendant by fraud and deceit and by undue influence, then and there practiced upon the plaintiff by the agents, servants and representatives of the defendants."

It is therefore apparent that the plaintiff did avail herself of the right accorded her by law to sustain any legitimate defense as against the agreement of accord and satisfaction, and, upon the evidence so introduced, the court has made a complete and comprehensive finding, from which it appears that the contract was obtained through fraud, deceit, and undue influence, but the findings in the case at bar do not disclose the fact that the plaintiff was so devoid of understanding as to render her contract of release a nullity. Section 38 of the Civil Code is as follows: "A person entirely without understanding has no power to make a contract of any kind, but he is liable for the reasonable value of things furnished to him necessary for his support or the support of his family."

[5] It was found by the court that plaintiff had explained to the defendant, his attorneys and representatives, that she was poor and destitute. The court also found that she was nervous and neurasthenic. Obviously, nervousness and neurasthenia do not constitute mental incompetency to such an extent as to render the transaction void ab initio, even though the transaction may be avoided by a timely rescission and tender of benefits received. We think the failure of the record to disclose a tender of the money received by plaintiff will necessitate a reversal of the judgment.

In her brief, respondent contends that on the day of trial she tendered to the appellant the sum of $1,250 which she had received as a consideration for the release she had signed, but since that fact, if it is a fact, does not appear in the judgment roll, it cannot be considered here. In view of the fact that the case will be remanded for a new trial, respondent will not be deprived of relying on that defense, and may file a proper supplemental pleading in the trial court, if so advised.

However, we feel constrained to say that we have reached the conclusion, herein expressed, with some degree of reluctance, and we do not wish to be understood as placing the stamp of judicial approval upon such practices as are disclosed by the record in this case. The practice of an insurance adjuster, disregarding and ignoring counsel for the plaintiff, and dealing with the plaintiff herself, and importuning her to effect a settlement which may be wholly inadequate, should meet with severe censure from the bench and bar of this state.

Judgment is reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

divorce decree was harmless, where other evidence was sufficient to support conclusion awarding child to father.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Marshall F. McComb, Judge.

Action by Mabel H. Kettelle against H. C. Kettelle in which a decree was entered for plaintiff granting her a divorce and awarding her the custody of a minor child. From a subsequent order awarding the custody of this child to defendant, plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Max Schleimer, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Walter T. Casey, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

An appeal by the plaintiff from an order made in the above action awarding to the defendant the custody of Pearl Kettelle, a minor child of the parties.

The action was one for divorce and the custody of two children, the issue of the marriage. On September 15, 1926, an interlocutory decree was entered adjudging that plaintiff was entitled to a divorce from defendant. The decree awarded the custody of Pearl Kettelle to the plaintiff, who was also allowed the sum of $125 per month for support, the payments to continue for one year. The court reserved the right to fix at the end of that period an amount to be paid by defendant for the care and support of Pearl Kettelle. The custody of the other child was awarded to the defendant. On September 28, 1927, a final decree of divorce was entered. The provisions of this decree followed those of the interlocutory decree, but the same was on November 22, 1927, modified on plaintiff's motion by providing that the defendant, commencing on December 1, 1927, should pay to plaintiff the sum of $50 per month for the support of Pearl Kettelle. On December 8, 1927, the court made an order, directing plaintiff to show cause why the decree awarding her the custody of Pearl Kettelle should not be vacated and the custody awarded to the defendant. This order was based on the affidavits of defendant and others, stating matters with respect to plaintiff's conduct and her care of the child which tended to show that it was for the best interests of the latter that the custody be changed. The material portions of these affidavits were controverted by others filed by plaintiff and by oral testimony adduced by her at the hearing, after which the order complained of was entered.

One affidavit filed by defendant referred to acts of plaintiff before the entry of the interlocutory decree, and others to acts and occur-

KETTELLE v. KETTELLE.

Civ. 7655.

District Court of Appeal, First District,
Division 1, California.

Dec. 9, 1930.

Rehearing Denied Jan. 8, 1931. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 5, 1931.

1. Divorce ☞303(1).

Final divorce decree awarding mother custody of child, in accordance with interlocutory decree, did not prevent subsequent consideration of occurrences after interlocutory decree, where change of custody was not litigated upon entry of final decree.

2. Judgment ☞585(5).

Former judgment is not conclusive as to new rights acquired pending action which were not required to be litigated therein (Code Civ. Proc. § 1911).

3. Divorce ☞298(1).

Welfare of child is paramount consideration in determining its custody in divorce suit between parents.

4. Divorce ☞312.

Conclusion of trial court in divorce suit as to custody of child will not be set aside in absence of clear abuse of discretion.

5. Divorce ☞298(3).

Custody of child may be awarded to parent whose offense caused divorce, if best interests of child will thus be served.

6. Appeal and error ☞920(1).

On appeal from order based on affidavits, those affidavits in favor of prevailing party must be taken as true.

7. Appeal and error ☞1032(1).

Prejudice from error must affirmatively appear to warrant reversal.

8. Divorce ☞312.

In proceedings for order changing custody of child, error in admitting affidavit which related to acts of mother before interlocutory rences between the entry of the interlocutory and final decrees. Plaintiff contends that these decrees adjudicated her fitness to have the custody of the child, and that the above evidence therefore was incompetent.

[1, 2] It has been held that to justify a modification of a divorce decree with respect to the custody of minor children there must be a change of circumstances after the original decree was entered. 19 Cor. Jur., Divorce, § 810, p. 350. Here, however, with the exception mentioned, the acts and omissions alleged followed the entry of the interlocutory decree, and the question whether the allegations, if true, rendered a change of custody for the best interests of the child, was not litigated upon the entry of the final decree. Brown v. Brown, 170 Cal. 1, 147 P. 1168, 1170. As stated in the case cited: "The general rule that a judgment is conclusive, not only as to that which is actually determined, but also as to every other matter which the parties might have litigated in the action, is not always applicable literally." And it does not apply to new rights acquired pending the action which might have been, but which were not, required to be litigated. Brown v. Brown, supra; Metropolis, etc., Sav. Bank v. Barnet, 165 Cal. 449, 132 P. 833. As provided by the Code, that only is deemed to have been adjudged in a former judgment which appears on its face to have been so adjudged, or which was actually and necessarily included therein or necessary thereto. Code Civ. Proc. § 1911.

[3-5] The paramount consideration in determining to whom the custody of a child shall be awarded in a divorce is the welfare of the child (Bancroft v. Bancroft, 178 Cal. 352, 173 P. 582); and the conclusion of the trial court in this respect will not be set aside in the absence of a clear abuse of discretion (Dickerson v. Dickerson, 108 Cal. 351, 41 P. 475). Nor, if it be for the best interest of the child, is there any rule preventing an award of its custody to the parent whose offense caused the divorce. Matter of Cozza, 163 Cal. 514, 126 P. 161, Ann. Cas. 1914A, 214; Lampson v. Lampson, 171 Cal. 332, 153 P. 238. As was said in Bell v. Krauss, 169 Cal. 387, 146 P. 874, 875: "Divorces are not granted for offenses against children, and the bestowal of the custody of a minor in a divorce action is not, unless otherwise provided by statute, an adjudication of the fitness of the parent who is for the time denied the right to retain possession of the child. It is nothing more than the expression of the court's belief that, under the circumstances then existing, the welfare of the child would be best subserved by placing said child with one of the parents rather than the other."

Here, so far as shown, there was no finding in any of the proceedings that either party was an unfit person to have the custody of the child, the conclusion of the court apparently being that the welfare of the child under the circumstances existing at the time of the entry of the interlocutory decree would be better subserved by placing her in the custody of her mother while the other child was placed in the custody of his father. Subsequently, however, conditions having changed, it was the conclusion of the court that the best interests of the child required a change of custody. We cannot say from the evidence that its conclusion was unsupported.

[6] In the consideration of an appeal from an order based upon affidavits, this court is bound by the same rule which controls when oral testimony is presented for review. If there is any conflict therein, those in favor of the prevailing party must be taken as true. Doak v. Bruson, 152 Cal. 17, 91 P. 1001.

[7, 8] While the affidavit covering the acts of the plaintiff previous to the entry of the interlocutory decree should, we think, have been excluded, nevertheless others related many similar instances of neglect which occurred thereafter. Prejudice from error is no longer presumed, but must affirmatively appear. Vallejo, etc., R. R. Co. v. Reed Orchard Co., 169 Cal. 545, 147 P. 238. The evidence was sufficient without this affidavit to support the court's conclusion; and after considering the whole record, including the evidence, we are of the opinion that no error is shown which would warrant a reversal of the order.

The order is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, of Los Angeles County; F. C. Valentine, Judge.

Action by J. Walter Lindsay against the Kleiber Motor Truck Company, a corporation, and another. From a judgment against named defendant, it appeals.

Reversed.

Wilbert Morgrage and R. K. Barrows, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Liggett & Liggett, of San Diego, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J.

The plaintiff commenced an action against the defendants and asked for judgment for the recovery of an automobile truck or for the value thereof in case a delivery could not be had. The defendant Maurice Haydis was not served and as to him the transaction was dismissed. The Kleiber Motor Truck Company, a corporation, answered, and a trial was had before the trial court sitting without a jury. The court made findings in favor of the plaintiff, and from a judgment entered thereon the corporation has appealed.

Some time prior to 1923 Maurice Haydis purchased under a conditional sales contract a motor truck from plaintiff. He operated it some time, and then he took it to the Kleiber Motor Truck Company and directed it to take out the engine and replace it with a new engine and to change it from a right-hand drive to a left-hand drive and make some other alterations therein. At that time the truck was under license for the year 1923. The record of the division of motor vehicles showed the legal owner to be J. Walter Lindsay and the registered owner to be M. Haydis. No claim is made that the defendant corporation at any time gave actual notice in writing to the plaintiff that it was about to make said repairs and alterations. The defendant proceeded to make the alterations and repairs and the same were completed in accordance with instructions and the truck was ready for delivery. However, Haydis left the truck remaining in the possession of the corporation and sold out his business. Thereafter he assigned his rights to the plaintiff on October 23, 1925. The assignment expressly mentioned the number of the new motor instead of the number of the old motor which had been removed. The plaintiff appeared at the office of the corporation, presented its assignment from Haydis, and asked for delivery of the truck. Neither at the time of the demand nor at any other time did the plaintiff make a tender of $100 or any other sum. The demand was refused. Thereafter and before action was commenced the corporation took off the truck the new parts which it had theretofore installed, and after having done so it continued to hold the dismantled truck for its lien for work and labor done (not including material furnished) for the full sum of $100 because, as it alleged, it had done and performed labor in a much larger sum. In his complaint the plaintiff alleged: "That at all times hereinafter mentioned, the plaintiff was and now is the owner of and entitled to the immediate possession of that certain three and one half ton Kleiber motor truck, Motor No. 2093b-51351, 1924 California license No. 61991." The trial court found the allegations to be true.

[1, 2] The defendant claims that the finding is not sustained by the evidence. The plaintiff also alleged a tender of $100. The trial court found the allegation to be true. The defendant claims that said findings are not supported by the evidence. They are not. There is not even a conflict in the evidence. It is all one way. It shows that, acting on the directions of Haydis, the defendant did work and furnished materials to the extent of $1,358.59, and that said sum was the reasonable value thereof. Both in its answer and during the trial the defendant claimed a lien of $100, the full amount allowed by the statute. Civ. Code, § 3051a. It did not claim more. In the absence of the statute just cited, the defendant was entitled to a lien in the sum of $1,358.59. Lininger Imp. Co. v. Queen City Foundry Co., 73 Colo. 412, 216 P. 527; Civ. Code, § 3051. However, section 3051a of the Civil Code had the effect, under the facts of this case, of curtailing the amount of the defendant's lien to the sum of $100. Until defendant's lien had been discharged the defendant was neither guilty of conversion nor was it liable in an action in replevin. 34 Cyc. 1403; 38 Cyc. 2030; Lininger Imp. Co. v. Queen City Foundry Co., supra; Cob- bey on Replevin, §§ 157-159; Sutton v. Stephan, 101 Cal. 545, 36 P. 106; Welker v. Appleman, 44 Ind. App. 699, 90 N. E. 35, 37; Mattingly v. Mattingly, 150 Md. 671, 133 A. 625. As everything the defendant did while acting under the directions of Haydis was lawful and within the terms of its contract of employment, no act in dismantling the truck or making alterations therein was in any sense an act of conversion. Lininger Imp. Co. v. Queen City Foundry Co., supra.

[3] Before commencing the action the plaintiff was bound to make a demand and accompany the demand with the payment, or tender of payment, of the lawful claim of lien made by the defendant. 34 Cyc. 1402-1404; 5 Cal. Jur. 169-170. Conceding that if a tender had been made the defendant might have been guilty of a constructive conversion, the record wholly fails to show that the tender was made. The plaintiff claims his complaint was a tender. A most cursory reading thereof shows it was not. But even though it was, the tender should have been made before the action was commenced. 34 Cyc. 1403; Cobbey on Replevin, § 520.

[4, 5] During the trial some evidence was introduced and later the court made some findings to the effect that after the work was completed on the truck Haydis bought another truck of the defendant which Haydis resold on a conditional sales contract and assigned the contract to the defendant. All those matters were entirely outside the issues made by the pleadings and said findings are nugatory. Furthermore, there is no evidence that the assignment was made or accepted in payment of the defendant's demand for which it claimed a lien. Said assignment was not therefore a payment. Palmer v. Emanuel, 77 Cal. App. 766, 770, 247 P. 609; Kane v. Eastman (Cal. App.) 288 P. 819.

[6] The defendant makes several points relating to the measure of damages. It complains because the judgment is not in the alternative. The plaintiff replies that the rule which requires that the judgment should be in the alternative is not inflexible and he cites and relies on Erreca v. Meyer, 142 Cal. 308, 75 P. 826; Seligman v. Armando, 94 Cal. 314, 29 P. 710, and he makes the claim that his action is very much like an action for conversion. In the two cases cited, both the taking and detention were wrongful. Conceding, without deciding plaintiff's claim as to the nature of his action, the claim is not an answer. As we have shown above, in the instant case there was no act of conversion. All that the defendant did down to the date of the trial it did as the authorized bailee of the registered owner. There was not, therefore, any evidence on which a conversion could be predicated. 38 Cyc. 2005; Hill v.

Finigan, 77 Cal. 267, 276, 19 P. 494, 11 Am. St. Rep. 270. Treated as an action in replevin, the plaintiff showed no wrongful taking. As he made no tender, there was no wrongful detention. He did not therefore lay any foundation for any damages as in an action for replevin. Mutch v. Long Beach Imp. Co., 47 Cal. App. 267, 190 P. 638; Hartnett v. Wilson, 31 Cal. App. 678, 161 P. 281; 5 Cal. Jur. 204 and 208.

The judgment is reversed.

PEOPLE v. CORDISH.
Cr. 1868.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 2, California.

Dec. 17, 1930.

Rehearing Denied Dec. 31, 1930. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 15, 1931.

1. Criminal law ⇨878(4).

Acquittal of forgery held not to require acquittal of conviction of grand theft based on same transaction; offenses not being identical (Pen. Code, §§ 470, 532).

Acquittal was not required, since one who forges instrument may be convicted under Pen. Code, § 470, whether or not he obtains money, while one who uses false instrument and obtains money from another need not have forged the instrument in order to commit offense denounced by section 532; thereby indicating that the two offenses are not identical.

2. False pretenses ⇨7(1).

Where purchaser permitted dealer's agent to sign automobile sale contract in his name if he would not be liable, company purchasing contract from dealer did not obtain what it contracted for, as regards dealer's defense in prosecution for grand theft (Pen. Code, § 532).

3. False pretenses ⇨43(2).

In grand theft prosecution by selling forged automobile sale contract, sustaining objection to cross-examination of purchaser's agent whose duty was merely clerical, seeking to show whether purchaser of alleged forged conditional sales contract relied on false representations, held proper (Pen. Code, § 532).

4. Witnesses ⇨380(5).

In grand theft prosecution, impeachment of witness for people held proper.

The prosecution was based on the sale of an alleged forged conditional sale contract, and the witness had previously made statement that he had obtained such contract on authority of defendant, but on trial such witness had a lapse of memory. The witness having denied recollection of former statements, but having admitted that they were taken by stenographer, same were identified and introduced in evidence, and the witness thereafter admitted on trial that he had told truth in first instance.

5. Criminal law ☞371(3).

In prosecution for grand theft by sale of forged automobile sale contract, various like contracts negotiated by defendant held admissible to show fraudulent intent.

6. False pretenses ☞51.

Evidence in prosecution for grand theft held to warrant submission to jury.

7. False pretenses ☞41.

In prosecution for grand theft by sale of forged automobile sale contract, evidence showing concerted plan of defendant to obtain money through negotiation of false evidence of automobile sales held admissible.

The evidence offered to show concerted plan consisted of evidence of ingenious manipulation of serial, motor, and license numbers of automobiles and introduction of original records of various financing institutions of the purchase of other worthless contracts for consideration at various times.

8. Criminal law ☞726.

In prosecution for grand theft, replying argument of counsel for people held not improper.

Counsel for people, in answer to comment of defendant's counsel on absence of certain witnesses, stated that, had it been known prior to the trial what their testimony might have been, the witnesses would have been called, but that it was at all times the defendant's privilege to have had them called if their evidence tended to support his defense.

CRAIG, J.

An indictment consisting of several counts was returned by the grand jury of Los Angeles county, charging the appellant and one E. K. Fleming with having forged certain contracts, and with having falsely and fraudulently taken moneys of certain named corporations. All counts were dismissed except one charging forgery and one charging grand theft. Fleming was acquitted of both offenses, and the appellant was found guilty of the crime of grand theft, and acquitted upon the other count. He appeals from the judgment and from an order denying a motion for new trial.

The first and principal point advanced is that the two offenses were so interrelated, though inconsistent, that an acquittal of one rendered legally impossible a conviction of the other. Specifically, the defendants were alleged in one count to have (1) forged the name of one William G. Schwindt to a purported contract for the purchase by Schwindt of an automobile from Mutual Motors, Incorporated; and (2) to have sold the worthless contract to the State Credit Corporation, for a valuable consideration, "well knowing the same was false, forged and counterfeited," and "with intent then and there to cheat and defraud the said State Credit Corporation, a corporation, William G. Schwindt, and others." The next count charged that the defendants did "steal, take and carry away" certain moneys of the personal property of the State Credit Corporation.

According to the evidence adduced, appellant was president both of the Mutual Motors, Inc., which dealt in automobiles, and of a real estate sales concern known as Mutual City, which were maintained in the same office and were in need of funds. The appellant employed one Arthur Green as a realty salesman, following a conversation wherein appellant stated that Mutual Motors might furnish a number of automobiles to Mutual City, in the names of financially responsible persons as ostensible purchasers, by obtaining their permission so to do. Appellant executed in blank several conditional sales contracts as president of Mutual Motors, in which Green thereafter inserted descriptive data relating to various automobiles, which contracts were negotiated by appellant's agents with finance companies as genuine securities or evidences of bona fide purchases of automobiles and agreements to pay cash therefor. In one such instance, which resulted in the present charges, Green explained to said Schwindt, the realty company's need of machines, and requested permission to so use his name. The latter testified: "I told him that if there wouldn't be any liability to me, and it would be a favor to him, I would allow him to place one car in my name. * * * I would agree to it if I didn't have any liability in connection with it." He did not testify that he authorized a sale in his name, or that he purchased an automobile, or sanctioned or knew of the issuance of a contract in his name, or that he ever consented to the signature of his name by Green. Thereafter Green inserted the description of an automobile, and signed the name "William G. Schwindt" as vendee, in one of the blank contracts previously executed in the name of Mutual Motors by appellant, as vendor, also filling in recitals of a cash payment of $840, and twelve monthly installments of $112.67, each falsely appearing to be due from Schwindt. Without Schwindt's knowledge or consent Green opened an account in a bank in the former's name, upon which a check was drawn in favor of the State Credit Corporation for the first payment, thus giving the transaction a semblance of validity. The check was dishonored by the bank and returned unpaid. Appellant executed an assignment of said contract to the last-mentioned company, wherein it was recited, in part: "For the purpose of inducing the assignee to purchase the within contract, the undersigned makes the following representations: (1) That the said contract is a bona fide one, and is actually signed by the person named therein * * * and that said property has been delivered into the possession of the party of the second part." It is not attempted to be asserted that Schwindt received the car. Upon representations and under the belief that this document was genuine, the credit company purchased the same and paid to appellant's motor company the moneys mentioned in the indictment, or the sum of $1,928.06. It resulted that one of appellant's salesmen for the realty company was furnished an automobile belonging to the motor company upon which a fictitious and valueless contract had been sold to State Credit Corporation for moneys with which appellant's two enterprises were financed. Concisely stated, one of appellant's salesmen drove appellant's car, under the name of a third person, who, with the understanding that there should be no liability, had agreed to a transaction without real parties nor the transfer of any property, and upon which the credit company paid nearly $2,000 for appellant's use and benefit. The jury found, in effect, by its verdict upon the forgery count that appellant did not sign nor cause the name of Schwindt to be signed without the latter's consent or knowledge. They did not find that he had forged the contract, and that knowing the same to have been forged that he did "utter, publish and pass the said contract for the payment of money * * * with intent then and there to cheat and defraud"; but they found that he stole, took, and carried away certain moneys of the State Credit Corporation. The theory upon which the trial was conducted was that said moneys were obtained by false and fraudulent representations, through the uttering and use by appellant's agent or agents of such worthless contract.

[1] It is here insisted that, while the people were not required to specify in the indictment the means by which the crime of grand theft was committed, they elected to and did proceed at the trial upon the theory that it was committed by the uttering of a forged and false instrument, and that they are precluded by the doctrine of estoppel to urge an affirmance upon the ground that it was committed by false and fraudulent pretenses. The argument advances but a visionary distinction without a difference. Although the jury might not have believed that appellant authorized and directed the physical signing of the name of a particular person, it lay within their province to determine whether upon all of the evidence before them the defendant knowingly obtained moneys upon false evidences of indebtedness, which were forged and uttered by his agent. The jury were at liberty to conclude, as we must assume they did, that the proof of having obtained moneys by means of the authorized and intended false pretenses as to the value of a given document was sufficient, though it did not exclude every hypothesis upon which innocence of the actual forgery and uttering might be based.

Upon the same premise it is argued that the offense of uttering a false instrument "is exactly the same offense as that of obtaining money * * * by false representations as contained in the contract," and that an acquittal upon the first count is legally irreconcilable with a verdict of guilty upon the second. The separate charges were based upon different sections of the Penal Code. Section 470 provides: "Every person who, with intent to defraud, signs the name of another person * * * knowing that he has no authority so to do, * * * or falsely makes, alters, forges * * * any * * * contract * * *; or utters, publishes, passes, or attempts to pass, as true and genuine, any of the above-named false * * * matters, * * * is guilty of forgery." Section 532 provides that: "Every person who knowingly and designedly, by any false or fraudulent representation or pretense, defrauds any other person of money, * * * is punishable in the same manner and to the same extent as for larceny of the money. * * *" It is apparent merely from reading them that one who forges, utters, and passes a false instrument may be convicted under section 470, whether or not he obtains money by such criminal acts; while one who by the use of a false document obtains money from another, knowing it to be false, need not have forged the same in order to have committed the offense denounced by section 532, and that the elements of the two offenses are not identical. An indictment may charge two or more different offenses connected together in their commission, of different statements of the same offense, in separate counts. Pen. Code, § 954. The defendant having been acquitted upon one count of an indictment containing alternative counts, it does not follow that the jury found all of the elements essential to the statement of that offense absent, but merely that they found absent elements distinguishing it from the offense alleged in the other count. This is the true test. People v. Day, 199 Cal. 78, 248 P. 250.

[2] A brief statement of appellant's contention that, notwithstanding the contract was not signed by the party of the second part, if another was authorized to sign it for him, the act of Green was the act of Schwindt, and the purchaser of the contract "obtained just what it expected to obtain," requires but slight consideration in view of the facts presented. There is no indication that any one other than appellant and his agent was cognizant of the true status of the transaction or was afforded any patent ground for distrust. A bona fide contract evidencing a valuable consideration, actually signed by the party named therein, who receives the specified property, is not akin to nor affected by an unauthorized signature to a fictitious evidence of liability upon which neither property nor consideration passes. The credit company was induced to accept and to pay cash for a purported security which the party therein named had not seen and of which he had no knowledge. It would be indeed a novel and fallacious theory by which such attempt to signify an obligation of Schwindt could be deemed a validation of the fraud depriving the purchaser of recourse, to the end that it might recover from him the cost of an automobile which appellant had simply changed from one hand to the other. There is no evidence tending to show that Schwindt ever learned that permission to place a car "in his name" had created a liability, nor that the credit company at any time relied upon any guaranty other than representations of appellant's agents as to the validity of the contract.

It is further suggested that the jury may have been confused by conflicting presumptions; that, since the evidence tended to show a custom of appellant to leave with agents contracts and assignments thereof, signed in blank, to be filled out "without his knowledge" when absent from the office, they may have inferred without warrant that these details were carelessly or surreptitiously performed by the agents. It is asserted that proof of execution of the documents in blank, coupled with the presumption that the ordinary course of business was followed and that appellant knew the nature of the transactions, should not be allowed to prevail over the stronger presumption of innocence. We are neither justified by the record nor inclined to assume that the jury did so presume and that they ignored other inferences of guilt which could well have been drawn. Fine distinctions in the probative effect of presumptions may not in the face of ample instructions be assumed to have distracted the attention of the jury in their consideration of issues so important to the people and to the defendant. There is no room for apprehension that the verdict may have been influenced by the presumption of innocence being confronted with the presumption that the private transactions were fair and regular, since we think the evidence tended fully to controvert both presumptions.

[3] During cross-examination of a witness who had acted as secretary of the credit company, who did not negotiate with Cordish, and whose duties with respect to contract after their purchase were clerical and subordinate, he was asked certain questions to which objections were sustained. Typical of these was the question as to whether or not the identity of the contracting purchaser was material to the company, so long as an automobile in fact did exist as security, and the motor company as vendor had guaranteed the contract. The purpose of such inquiry was to elicit whether or not the State Credit Corporation relied upon the alleged false representations. It appeared that the witness was not in an executive capacity to dictate or control the policies or business activities of the company, and was not invested with discretion as to the acceptance or rejection of securities. Any answer which he could have given would have been hearsay, and a conclusion. Other questions as to conversations during directors' meetings, also to ascertain the reason for purchasing contracts, were objected to upon the ground that the witness was not qualified to state upon whom the purchasing company relied, and that his reply would be hearsay. It is insisted that, if he had been permitted to swear that contracts were purchased and paid for, regardless of their intrinsic value, no offense could have been chargeable to appellant. There was no showing that the credit company's manager who did conduct the negotiations but was not present at the trial conspired with Cordish or his agent to finance the realty or motor sales business upon fictitious securities, nor that such a scheme was suspected by the credit company. We think objections to an attempt to compel this witness to so testify were properly sustained. The argument that he was the only representative of the company available, and that he had produced and identified its record, is not persuasive as to the competency of his testimony, with respect to matters beyond his own clerical sphere of employment and observation.

[4] Contentions that error was committed in allowing the district attorney to impeach a witness called by the people, that he was guilty of misconduct in so doing, and that the court erred in stating to the jury that the impeachment should be considered as evidence against the defendant, without instructing them to the contrary, are fallacious. The witness Green, who had previously made a statement that he obtained and acted upon the authority of Cordish in negotiating seven false and fictitious documents, suffered a lapse of memory and became adverse toward the prosecution while on the stand. Pressed for answers, his memory was refreshed by said statement, over objections by the defense, and finally he admitted that he had given prior inconsistent answers to material questions. We are unable to find in the record any statement to the jury by the court that the impeachment should be viewed as evidence. The defendant's counsel were informed by the court in ruling upon objections to impeaching questions that the witness' answer under oath that he had had no conversation with the defendant upon the subject "would aid the defense, and if it would aid the defense it would damage the prosecution." The jury were instructed that they should disregard and draw no inferences from the remarks of the court or counsel, and that they should consider the evidence only. We find no misconduct of a prejudicial character, nor error in the principles so announced. It follows that authorities cited by appellant in support of these contentions are not in point. We also think a proper and sufficient foundation for such evidence was established. Green, having at first denied any recollection of his former statements, admitted that they were taken by a stenographer, whereupon a transcript thereof was identified and introduced in evidence. The witness thereafter admitted that he had told the truth in the first instance, and reticently acknowledged that he had then made the statements contained in the transcript. This evidence was properly received.

[5] Following evidence of the preparation and negotiation of the subject-matter of this prosecution as above detailed, various like contracts which had been similarly supplied with names, descriptions, and fictitious values, and which had likewise been negotiated as of face value, were offered in evidence and admitted over objections of the defendant. They were not offered as evidence of other offenses, but for the purpose of showing the existence of a fraudulent intent, and a concerted plan of the defendant and others to finance the business by sales of worthless paper, "for the purpose of overcoming the presumption that the act was innocently or accidentally done without the particular intent which constitutes an element of the offense," and the jury were so instructed. It is argued that these contracts were not admissible for the purpose of proving the corpus delicti or of showing the commission of other offenses, that Schwindt was liable under his contract for the amounts therein specified, and that the corpus delicti was not proved. However, as previously stated, Schwindt merely authorized the use of his name, though it does not appear in what manner he so intended or expected it to be used, with the express understanding that he should not "have any liability in connection with it." A large number of these purported "contracts," bearing names of persons who had not purchased automobiles, who had paid nothing, whom appellant had intended should not be liable thereon, and from whom nothing was due, furnished instances of a general financing scheme upon one of which Cordish was prosecuted. The people contended that others by lending their names in the accomplishment of appellant's criminal objective had conspired with him and were equally guilty, but the jury were properly instructed that such evidence should be accepted only for the purpose for which it was offered. There was substantial evidence tending to support a finding, as the jury must have found, that money was fraudulently obtained upon one such subterfuge, and the offer of others as evidence of a common intent and plan upon which it was negotiated was not error. "It is a familiar and established rule in this state that even evidence of another crime is pertinent, and will not be excluded if it tends logically, naturally, and by reasonable inference to establish any fact material for the people to overcome. People v. Sanders, 114 Cal. 230, 46 P. 153. Evidence of a material fact which tends to show intent or motive, even though it tends to establish another crime, is admissible." People v. Kizer, 22 Cal. App. 10, 133 P. 516, 518, 521, 134 P. 346.

[6, 7] The corpus delicti, i. e., the signing by Cordish of the so-called Schwindt contract and assignment thereof for the purpose and with the intent of enabling Green to complete the swindle, and appellant's knowledge of its perpetration, was sufficiently established to warrant submission of the case to the jury. Evidence was received over objections tending to show a concerted plan of appellant, Fleming, Green, and others, to obtain money for financing the two corporations through the negotiation of false evidence of automobile sales. As an asserted incident of their scheme, evidence of an ingenious manipulation of serial, motor, and license numbers was offered, and original records of various financing institutions of the purchase of other worthless contracts for a consideration at various times was introduced. Contentions that such evidence was inadmissible are therefore without merit. Criticism of its weight upon appeal is equally frivolous.

[8] The defendant's counsel in argument to the jury expounded at length upon the absence of certain witnesses, to which opposing counsel responded that, had it been known prior to the trial what their testimony might have been, they would have been called, but that it was at all times the defendant's privilege to have had them called if their evidence tended to support his defense. In the briefs upon appeal and in his petition for a rehearing in this court, appellant strenuously urged the argument of the district attorney upon this subject as prejudicial misconduct. As stated in our former opinion, we find nothing in the language of the people's counsel which may be so construed. At any rate the point is utterly without merit for the reason that, whatever the district attorney said which might otherwise be viewed as objectionable was in reply to argument on the same point by counsel for the defendant. The tenor of the latter's argument is indicated by the following excerpts: "Did the district attorney produce Mr. Marks to prove that he did not authorize Pond to sign his name to this contract? No, and why?" "If they do not produce evidence that is favorable to them, you have got to construe that the evidence would be against them." Rebuttal argument in such instances is not improper. People v. McRoberts, 1 Cal. App. 25, 81 P. 734.

The remaining points consist of exceptions to the construction placed upon certain evidence by the district attorney's deputies during argument, and to the sufficiency of the evidence as a whole. The statements so made were no more than exaggerations, and they were withdrawn, and the jury were instructed to disregard them. A careful examination of the record, which consists of some four thousand pages, fails to reveal any reversible error, and we think the evidence warranted the verdict and judgment rendered under the instructions given.

The judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

Action by Parthenia D. Sinsbaugh against Philip T. Lyons, for appellant.

Swing & Wilson, of San Bernardino, for respondent.

MARKS, J.

This action grew out of a motor vehicle accident which happened about 4 o'clock in the afternoon of December 18, 1928, in the intersection of Colton avenue and Anderson street in San Bernardino county. Colton avenue runs east and west, and Anderson street intersects it at right angles. Appellant was riding south on Anderson street in an automobile driven by Miss V. M. Riddle. It came into collision with another automobile being driven east on Colton avenue by respondent.
Appellant and Miss Riddle were thrown to the pavement by the impact and seriously injured. They brought separate actions for damages, which were consolidated and tried together before a jury which returned a verdict in favor of respondent. This appeal is taken by appellant from the judgment entered following the verdict.

Appellant maintains that the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict and judgment and that the verdict is contrary to law and the evidence; that errors of law prejudicial to appellant occurred during the trial; and that the court erred in giving instructions proposed by respondent. The only error of law occurring during the trial specified in her brief is the refusal of the trial court to grant her motion made at the close of the evidence "for a directed verdict against the defendant." There was no error in the denial of this motion. We will not consider it separately, as we must discuss the sufficiency of the evidence to support the judgment under the other specifications of error.

The evidence shows that Miss Riddle was a huckster, engaged in the business of selling fruits, vegetables, and other such produce from house to house, having done business with appellant for over a year prior to the accident. Some days prior to December 18, 1928, appellant told Miss Riddle that she wanted to purchase a milk goat. Miss Riddle found such goats for sale near Loma Linda and on the day of the accident was taking appellant to see them. Miss Riddle would have received a commission from the owner of the goats if a sale had been consummated.

Colton avenue is a link in a main traffic artery leading from the city of Los Angeles easterly through Los Angeles county and into San Bernardino county, connecting the cities of Colton and Redlands in the latter county.
Boulevard stop signs were posted on Anderson street both north and south of its intersection with Colton avenue. At the trial it was stipulated by counsel for both parties that, by an ordinance of San Bernardino county, Colton avenue was designated as a boulevard, and vehicles on Anderson street were required to be brought to a full stop before entering the intersection. Upon this stipulation the case was tried on the theory that vehicles on Anderson street were required by lawful enactment to stop before entering Colton avenue. The ordinance does not appear in the record.

[1-3] We have carefully read the evidence in this case, having in mind the contention of appellant that it is insufficient to sustain the verdict and judgment. Counsel for appellant in his opening brief, and after quoting at length from the evidence upon this point, states his conclusions as follows: "From the foregoing, the most that can be said is, that there is a conflict of evidence as to whether the defendant (Miss Clark) or the driver of the car, Riddle, was negligent, or whether both of these parties were negligent." Our study of the case leads us to agree with this conclusion. Conflicts in evidence are addressed to the jury or the trial court. The jury resolved this conflict in favor of one party and against the other, and this court cannot disturb the verdict because the evidence was conflicting. Treadwell v. Nickel, 194 Cal. 243, 228 P. 25. All reasonable inferences from the evidence must be resolved in favor of the support of the verdict and judgment. Bandle v. Commercial Bank of Los Angeles, 178 Cal. 546, 174 P. 44.

[4, 5] In reviewing a case of this kind, it is only necessary for us, in determining whether or not there is material evidence to sustain the judgment, to summarize the evidence favorable to the prevailing party. From the evidence in this case it appears that respondent, with her sister as a passenger, was driving her automobile east on her right-hand side of Colton avenue at a speed of not over 35 miles per hour. Upon reaching the intersection this speed was reduced to about 20 miles per hour. There is nothing in the evidence to force the conclusion that the street crossing was an obstructed intersection as defined in subdivision (b) paragraph 2 of section 113 of the California Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 553, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1436). The two vehicles entered the intersection at about the same time, with respondent upon the right of the Riddle car, which did not stop on Anderson street before entering the intersection. When it appeared that a collision was imminent, respondent swerved her car sharply to her right, and Miss Riddle kept on her course, driving the front of her automobile into the left side of the Clark car; the place of the impact being from about the rear of the driver's seat forward to near the front end. The collision occurred on the south-east quarter of the intersection east of the center line of Anderson street. Miss Riddle testified that she was proceeding between 15 and 20 miles per hour at the time of the collision; that at such speed she could stop her car within 5 or 6 feet; that she proceeded between 30 and 40 feet after seeing respondent's car before the impact. Her testimony concerning her action just before the collision was as follows:

"Q. Who did you see coming? A. Miss Clark.

"Q. That is Lillian Clark; what was she coming in? A. She was coming in a nice looking car.

"Q. Was it an open or closed car? A. Closed car.

"Q. Where did you first see her? A. Why I saw her when she was about 50 feet away from us.

"Q. Where were you when you saw her? A. In the middle of the road.

"Q. What did you do? A. I put on the gas and tried to get across the road before she would reach me."

With this evidence before it the jury was justified in concluding that respondent was not negligent and that Miss Riddle was negligent in the operation of her automobile, and that such negligence was the proximate cause of the accident and the consequent injuries to plaintiff. The evidence we have summarized was sharply disputed in some particulars, but this at best created a conflict which the jury resolved in favor of respondent.

[6, 7] Appellant further contends that the evidence shows that respondent was guilty of negligence in the operation of her car just before the accident. Assuming this to be true and that the jury concluded that both respondent and Miss Riddle were guilty of negligence in the operation of their cars before the accident, it was still the province of the jury to determine which act of negligence was the proximate cause of the injury to appellant or whether or not the concurrent negligence of both drivers proximately caused the collision. "The question of proximate cause was one for the jury, and if that be true, their decision cannot be disturbed on appeal. Newman v. E. E. Overholtzer Sons' Co., 182 Cal. 778, 190 P. 175; Anderson v. Seropian, 147 Cal. 201, 81 P. 521; Dougherty v. Ellingson, 95 Cal. App. 87, 275 P. 456." Olden v. Babicora Development Co. (Cal. App.) 290 P. 1062, 1069. The finding of the jury in favor of respondent on these questions is final. 19 Cal. Jur. 732.

[8] Appellant criticizes some of the instructions proposed by respondent and given by the court mainly upon the ground that clauses in some of them charge on questions of law not presented by the evidence. We have reviewed all of the instructions, and think that, taken as a whole, they were fair to all parties, and the jury was not misled by them. This being the case, we cannot reverse the judgment because certain phrases used might not be considered applicable to the facts in evidence. Marston v. Pickwick Stages, 78 Cal. App. 526, 248 P. 930; Wright v. Salzberger & Sons, 81 Cal. App. 690, 254 P. 671; Douglas v. Southern Pacific Co., 203 Cal. 390, 264 P. 237; Weaver v. Carter, 28 Cal. App. 241, 152 P. 323; Lower v. Hughes, 80 Cal. App. 444, 251 P. 952. We conclude that the case was fairly tried, and that the record contains no error prejudicial to the rights of appellant.

Dec. 23, 1930.

1. Appeal and error $\S$ 935(1).

To support subsequent judgment, appellate court must assume that former judgment was properly set aside, as recited by findings and judgment.

2. Appeal and error $\S$ 714(5).

In determining whether judgment was properly set aside, statements of fact appearing merely in briefs cannot be considered.

3. Mortgages $\S$ 163(3).

Materialman's lien, filed in July, was subordinate to lien of mortgage, executed by owner to contractor and filed in previous February.

4. Mechanics' liens $\S$ 216(2).

Materialman who, at contractor's request, executed false receipt in full, thereby inducing mortgagee to accept mortgage, and causing owner's subsequent payment to mortgagee, held estopped to enforce lien.

It appeared that mortgagee agreed to purchase mortgage only if there were no liens on property, and that execution of receipt in question by materialman caused owner to discharge mortgage, thereby making it possible for purported lien of materialman to become only lien on property, and also caused mortgagee to buy mortgage from contractor, thereby removing burden from contractor, on whom it rightfully belonged.

STURTEVANT, J.

This is an action to foreclose a mechanic's lien. The plaintiff's complaint named F. B. Doerr and Silvio Osti and a number of fictitious individuals as defendants. The record discloses that summons was served on Doerr, that he did not answer, and that his default was entered. The record also discloses that summons was served on the defendant Osti, that he did answer, and that as to him a trial was had before the court sitting without a jury. The court made findings in favor of the defendant, and from a judgment entered thereon the plaintiff has appealed, and has brought up typewritten transcripts.

[1-4] The plaintiff claims that the trial court erred in vacating the judgment without vacating the default; that it also erred in setting aside the default after considerable lapse of time; and that no estoppel arose against the plaintiff by reason of the issuance by it of a certain receipt. We will discuss the foregoing points in the order stated. The attack on the motion to set aside the judgment and the claim that the default in name was not set aside are questions not supported by the record before us. In the clerk's transcript appear what purport to be two judgment rolls. The first judgment roll contains a copy of a judgment which purports to be a default judgment against the defendant Doerr and the defendant Osti, and is dated the 4th day of June, 1927. The transcript does not contain any attack thereon, nor any order vacating or setting it aside. In the second judgment roll appears a set of findings. Those findings recite that a former judgment was set aside. The judgment in the second roll contains a similar recital. The record is wholly silent whether the same was set aside by the stipulation of the parties or on motion, and if the latter, on what grounds, on whose motion, and at what time the order was made. In support of the judgment we must assume that at a proper time and in a proper manner the first judgment was set aside. In this connection we are not at liberty to look at certain statements of fact that appear merely in the briefs. The plaintiff's complaint appears to be in ordinary form. The contract for building the house was $5,500. Early in 1924 Silvio Osti as owner and F. P. Doerr as contracfor agreed upon the contract. By its terms the owner executed to the contractor his promissory note in the sum of $5,500 and executed a mortgage to secure its payment. Both instruments were delivered and the mortgage was recorded February 16, 1924. It is alleged that the plaintiff's claim for lumber and materials amounted to $1,198.35. The record does not show the exact date of the completion. The claim of lien was filed July 30, 1924. That lien was subordinate to the mortgage lien. In his answer, defendant set forth certain denials and then he pleaded an estoppel. The estoppel so pleaded, among other things, consisted of the following facts: After the building had been completed Doerr proceeded to negotiate a sale of the note and mortgage that had theretofore been executed by the defendant. He applied to the Downey Finance Company as a prospective purchaser. That company stated that it would purchase the note and mortgage if there were no liens on the property and if there was no other defense to the note and mortgage. Upon the request of that company, Doerr applied to this plaintiff for a receipt in full. The plaintiff executed the receipt under date of May 10, 1924. Doerr then exhibited that receipt to the defendant. After examining the receipt, acting on the request of the Downey Finance Company, this defendant executed a written disclaimer in which he disclaimed that there were any offsets or other defenses to said note and mortgage. At the time of the assignment the defendant had made some small payments pursuant to the terms of his note. Acting on the information which he had, thereafter he proceeded to make his payments promptly to the Downey Finance Company and at the time of the trial had entirely paid off the mortgage lien. The plaintiff asserts that there could be no estoppel unless respondent in some manner relied on the said receipt to his financial detriment. That is true, but the evidence shows that the defendant did suffer the financial detriment. Every payment he made on the mortgage after seeing the receipt dated May 10, 1924, was such detriment. If the receipt had not been exhibited to him, his property was subject to the mortgage lien and in order to recover as on a mechanic's lien the plaintiff would have been compelled to buy up the mortgage lien. But having caused the receipt to be published, the defendant was lulled to sleep and was caused to pay off the note and mortgage and thus make it possible for the purported lien of the plaintiff to become the only lien. Furthermore, if the false receipt had not been published and if the defendant had been informed of the true facts, he never would have issued the written disclaimer. If that had never been issued the Downey company would not have purchased the note and mortgage and the burden would have rested where it rightfully belonged, to-wit, on Doerr.

We find no error in the record. The judgment is affirmed.

PLUMMER, J.

The plaintiff had judgment for the return of money theretofore by him paid to the defendants for and on account of the purchase price of certain real estate under a certain writing purporting to be an agreement of purchase and sale. From this judgment the defendants appeal.

The findings of the trial court, sustained by the testimony, show the following: That on or about the 4th day of November, 1923, the said plaintiffs and defendants entered into a writing by the terms of which the defendants purported to sell, and the plaintiff purported to buy certain real property therein referred to as lot 18 of tract proposed to be numbered 4175, being a portion of lot 13 of subdivision of Rancho La Canada, as per map of said lot now on record in book 4 at page 351, Miscellaneous Records of Los Angeles County. The court further found that the map referred to was a private map, and then found as follows: "That said private map had not been, at that time, and was not until the 24th day of April, 1925, filed for record in the office of the County Recorder of the County of Los Angeles." The court further found that the plaintiff knew, at the time he purchased the premises and executed the said agreement, that no map or plat of said tract had been recorded in the office of the county recorder of Los Angeles county; that said lot 18 of said proposed tract could not have been identified, and said description was not a sufficient description of any real property whatever, without reference to the map or plat of said tract thereafter recorded. The court in its findings referred to the act of the Legislature declaring void agreements such as the writing executed by the plaintiff and the defendants, and further found that both the plaintiff and the defendants knew, or should have known of the existence of the act of the Legislature requiring maps to be recorded. The court further found the amount which the plaintiff had paid on the purchase price of said lot, and awarded judgment for the repayment thereof.

It is but fair to counsel for appellants to state that in their closing brief they frankly call attention to the case of White v. Jacobs, 204 Cal. 334, 267 P. 1087, which practically disposes of the issues involved herein. In that case it is held (quoting from the syllabus): "Sale or offer for sale of lots of land by reference to an unrecorded map or plat is expressly prohibited by the statute of 1907 (Stats. 1907, p. 290), and contracts for such sales based thereon are illegal and void; and the fact that the purchaser, who is seeking to recover the money paid on account of such illegal and void transaction, knew that the map referred to therein was unrecorded constitutes no defense to the right to recover." To the same effect is the case of Kozlowski v. Adams, 102 Cal. App. 578, 283 P. 365. The circumstances here presented are identical in so far as the determination of this cause is concerned, with circumstances involved in the cases referred to, and basing our decision upon those cases, the judgment of the trial court must be affirmed. And it is so ordered.

All concur.

PER CURIAM.

The plaintiff had judgment against the defendants for the return of money paid under an alleged agreement of sale for a certain lot or tract of land in a certain tract proposed to be numbered 4175. This is a companion case with that of P. H. Hubbard v. Frank B. Turner and L. B. McCright, 294 P. 465, this day decided. The facts surrounding the execution of the purported contract for the sale of real estate are identical with those involved in the Hubbard Case. No plat or map of the proposed tract had been filed for record at the time of the execution of the purported agreement of sale. The authorities cited in the case of Hubbard v. Turner and McCright are controlling here, and necessitate an affirmation of the judgment. And it is so ordered.

2. Appeal and error ⇨204(3).

Objection to oral evidence to explain escrow instructions is waived where not made in trial court.

3. Evidence ⇨450(1).

Escrow instructions held ambiguous as to whether purchaser or vendors should obtain lessee's signature; hence parol evidence was properly admitted.

Original escrow instructions contained no reference to lease; first supplemental instruction merely stated signatures of lessor and lessee constituted approval of lease when signed by them, and second supplemental instruction merely stated that lease was to be signed by lessee and vendors.

4. Vendor and purchaser $\Rightarrow$ 301, 314(3).

Vendor may bring action at law for purchase price and need not allege or prove consideration was fair and adequate (Civ. Code, § 3307).

5. Vendor and purchaser $\Rightarrow$ 148, 303.

Placing deed in escrow as agreed constituted continuing tender of performance by vendors and was sufficient to support action for purchase price.

SPENCE, J.

This action was brought by plaintiffs to recover from defendant the sum of $6,500 as the balance due on the purchase price of certain real property. From a judgment in favor of plaintiffs, defendant appeals.

The original agreement between the parties was evidenced by an instrument in the nature of escrow instructions dated April 9, 1927, and designated "Buyer and Seller Instructions." This instrument was signed by the parties and deposited with the Title Guarantee & Trust Company. It provided for the payment of $10,500 by the defendant and for the deposit in escrow of a deed executed by plaintiffs to be delivered to defendant upon payment of $10,500. It further provided for the payment to plaintiffs of $4,000 of the purchase price as soon as the title company could show title free and clear. No mention was made of any lease in the original instructions. Upon the trial it appeared that plaintiffs had deposited the deed with the escrow holder and had received $4,000. Upon stipulation by the defendant "that the plaintiffs performed each and every act necessary and requisite to be done by them, except that they did not secure the signature of Mr. Brown to the lease as provided by the escrow instructions" and the further stipulation that the defendant had not paid the $6,500, plaintiffs rested.

Under the allegations of the answer and cross-complaint defendant offered to show that the original agreement had been modified by supplemental instructions, which evidence was admitted. It appeared that on the day the original instructions were deposited supplemental instructions bearing the same date were signed and deposited with the escrow holder which read in part as follows:

"Mutually supplementing our instructions of this date, the payment of the $4,000.00 by the grantee to the grantor of this escrow is contingent upon the grantor (Bonner) placing in escrow for grantee a lease dated April 9th, 1927, by and between Robert A. Brown Jr. and Chris E. Schirm, lessees; W. Folsom Bonner lessor, the signatures of the lessor and the lessee constitute their approval of said lease when signed by them, and your company is relieved from certifying to the regularity, validity or sufficiency of same being responsible for delivery only to Easter May Finney of this lease at the close of escrow. In the event that this lease is not signed by W. Folsom Bonner and placed in this escrow your company will not pay out $4000.00 previously mentioned.

"[Signed] W. Folsom Bonner

"[Signed] Robert A. Brown, Jr.

"[Signed] Chris. E. Schirm

"The above is hereby approved, and I have initialed said lease, which constitutes my approval and acceptance of said lease.

"[Signed] Easter May Finney."

The lease above referred to was placed in escrow and was signed by plaintiffs and by Robert A. Brown, Jr., and Chris E. Schirm, the lessee named. This lease was an "oil and gas lease" which was quite lengthy, but omitted any proper description of the property. On April 12, 1927, further supplemental instructions were signed and deposited with the escrow-holder, which instructions read in part as follows:

"Mutually amending our instructions of April 9th, 1927, you will cancel and deface that certain lease dated April 9th, 1927, which does not disclose legal description and in lieu thereof Lessor W. Folsom Bonner and wife and Easter May Finney hand you a lease in favor of Robert A. Brown Jr., and Chris E. Schirm, dated April 9th, 1927, which you will deliver to Easter May Finney, at close of escrow, said lease is approved by us as evidenced by our signatures on same and your company is relieved from certifying to any acts contained in this lease or to its regularity, validity or sufficiency, being responsible for delivery only. Said Lease is to be signed by Robert A. Brown, Jr., and Martha J. Bonner, Grantee (Easter May Finney) hands you Cashier's check No. 540098 on the Bank of Italy, Long Beach Branch, in favor of Mrs. E. M. Finney and endorsed by her to your Company, and your Company is instructed to pay my Grantor the sum of $4000.00 immediately in compliance with my original instructions as I have this day seen your search of title covering property in this escrow, showing vested in my Grantor who has placed in escrow a deed in my favor which I approve. I fully understand that this escrow has not been completed and your Company is relieved from any liability or responsibility on account of my paying this money to my Grantor prior to the completion of this escrow.

"[Signed] Easter May Finney
"[Signed] W. Folsom Bonner."

This second lease was delivered to the escrow holder and signed by the plaintiffs. It was also signed by the lessee Schirm, but was never signed by the lessee Robert A. Brown, Jr.

[1] On the trial the main issue to which testimony was directed was whether the signature of the lessee Brown was to be obtained by defendant or plaintiffs, and a great amount of conflicting testimony was offered by both sides on this issue without objection. Upon this conflicting testimony the court found that the plaintiffs had not agreed to obtain the signatures of the lessees but that defendant had agreed to obtain said signatures. There was ample evidence to sustain these findings. The testimony offered by plaintiffs showed that they agreed to sign the lease at the request of defendant and solely for defendant's accommodation and convenience; that the lessees were unknown to plaintiffs and that it was not until after the original instructions had been signed that defendant approached them concerning the signing of the lease; that defendant asked plaintiffs to sign the lease, stating that she desired the driller to get to work prior to the termination of the escrow; that plaintiffs did not agree to obtain the signatures of the lessees, but, on the contrary, defendant stated that she would obtain these signatures.

[2, 3] Upon this appeal appellant contends that oral evidence was not admissible to explain or construe the escrow instructions as those instructions were not ambiguous. This objection may not be raised for the first time upon appeal and the objection is waived where the appellant fails to object to the testimony in the trial court. Inner Shoe Tire Co. v. Tondro, 83 Cal. App. 689, 257 P. 211; 2 Cal. Jur. 267, § 84. But aside from the waiver of the objection, we are satisfied that the escrow instructions were uncertain and ambiguous.

The instructions were informal and contained no definite terms imposing the obligation to obtain the lessees' signatures upon either plaintiffs or defendant. Appellant states that by the terms of the instructions there was no obligation on the part of the appellant to obtain the signature of the lessee Brown. It is likewise true that the terms of the instructions did not impose that obligation upon the plaintiffs. This issue could only be determined by resort to parol evidence and the court properly admitted such evidence and made its findings thereon.

[4] Appellant further contends that the respondents were not entitled to judgment for the contract price. Appellant argues that the respondents' remedy, if any, was in damages under section 3307 of the Civil Code, and that the judgment for the full contract price is a judgment for specific performance and is unauthorized by the pleadings, there being no allegation or proof that the consideration was fair and adequate. If this were an open question in this state, there might be merit in the position taken by the appellant, but it has long been settled that a vendor may bring an action at law for the purchase price in which action it is unnecessary to allege or prove that the consideration was fair and adequate. Amaranth Land Co. v. Corey, 182 Cal. 66, 186 P. 765; North Stockton, etc., Co. v. Fischer, 138 Cal. 100, 70 P. 1082, 71 P. 438; Weisenberg v. Hirschhorn, 97 Cal. App. 532, 275 P. 997; Burg Bros. v. Bercut, 73 Cal. App. 114, 238 P. 166; Paramore v. Colby, 45 Cal. App. 559, 188 P. 72.

[5] Appellant further contends that there was no delivery of the deed and consequently the purchase price did not become payable. In support of this contention appellant cites authorities to the effect that title does not pass when a deed is placed in escrow. These authorities are not in point. Under the cases above cited delivery of the deed was not essential. The placing of the deed in escrow constituted a continuing tender of performance on the part of plaintiff and was sufficient.

The judgment is affirmed.

Civ. 80.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District,
California.

Dec. 20, 1930.

Rehearing Granted Jan. 14, 1931.

1. Railroads ⇨309.

Duties and rights of interurban electric railroad in operating trains over crossing in rural territory were similar to those of company operating steam-propelled trains.

Right of way was owned by company which maintained depots for convenience of freight and passenger service, and maintained regular schedule of arrival and departure of freight and passenger trains.

2. Railroads ⇨313.

Failure of motorman of train to sound bell or whistle 80 rods from crossing was negligence per se (Civ. Code, § 586; Pen. Code, § 390).

Failure to give the required warning signal was a violation of certain provisions of law by defendant from which injury followed to another, and hence negligence.

3. Railroads ⇨330(2).

That crossing signals were out of order and continually operating did not absolve deceased, familiar with condition, from exercising due care.

Deceased must have known of defective condition of signals, as he had passed over crossing several times during period they were out of order.

4. Railroads ⇨328(3).

Failure of driver approaching unprotected crossing, view being obstructed, to alight from automobile and advance to ascertain if train is approaching, is contributory negligence.

5. Railroads ⇨350(16).

Where work train, not on regular schedule, followed regular passenger train on single-track road at interval of between 30 and 90 seconds, whether motorist, struck by work train, was contributorily negligent in not observing all precautions held for jury.

The passing of the passenger train in front of motorist was sufficient indication to him that tracks would remain clear for more than ninety seconds, so that quantum of care required of him as reasonably prudent man before proceeding onto tracks was question of fact for jury.

Whether automobile was moving at time when struck did not definitely appear from evidence, but eyewitnesses were positive deceased did not stop before the front of his truck was on the tracks or stopped so near thereto it was struck by train.

6. Appeal and error ⇨999(1).

Case being properly before jury, finding could not be disturbed.

7. Railroads ⇨350(16).

Whether approaching electric train was heard by deceased motorist held for jury.

8. Trial ⇨194(3).

Instruction that, if jury believed negative testimony of witnesses who heard no signal prior to accident, conclusion was warranted no signal was given held not erroneous as on weight of evidence.

Jury was elsewhere correctly instructed on burden of proof, credibility of witnesses, that jurors were sole judges of value and effect of evidence and not bound to decide in conformity with declarations of any number of witnesses not producing conviction in their minds, and that testimony of one witness entitled to full credit is sufficient for proof of any fact if it satisfied their minds, as against other witnesses not so satisfying them.

9. Appeal and error ⇨930(2).

Where word of common import is used in instruction, jury is deemed to have understood and applied to it ordinary meaning.

10. Trial ⇨296(3).

Instruction referring to whistle signal "immediately prior to accident" held not misleading or prejudicial in light of other instructions.

Jury must be held to have understood given instruction and applied to it its usual and ordinary meaning, as against contention that phrase was indefinite as to time and might be construed to refer to whistle, which was allegedly sounded when work train was about eight hundred feet from place of accident. "Immediately" is word of common use, the meaning of which is well understood and is variously defined as "without interval of time; without delay; straightway; instantly; at once; without lapse of time; without the intervention of anything; directly; forthwith."

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Immediately," see Words and Phrases.]

11. Appeal and error ⇨1064(1).

Instruction that, if crossing bell was out of order and rang continuously to deceased's knowledge, it gave no warning of approach of train, held not to warrant reversal.

Conclusion to be drawn from facts should have been left to jury, but instruction merely stated logical and obvious conclusion, a mere commonplace within general knowledge of jurors, and would not warrant a reversal.

12. Railroads ⇨347(11).

When admissible, evidence of deceased's habit as to stopping, looking, and listening at crossing must be limited to place of accident.

13. Death ⇨60.

Evidence of deceased's habit at railroad crossing is inadmissible, where there are eye-witnesses to accident.

14. Appeal and error ⇨1050(1).

Erroneous admission of deceased's habit at railroad crossing, in view of slight evidence thereof and positive testimony deceased did not stop, held not prejudicial.

McNabb & McCloskey, of San Bernardino, and Kenneth C. Wiseman, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

MARKS, J.

This is an appeal from a judgment entered in favor of respondents for damages resulting from the death of Peady Gilbert Lindsey. The case was tried before a jury.

Respondents are the widow and minor children of Peady Gilbert Lindsey, deceased, who was killed at about 8:20 o'clock on the morning of March 20, 1928, in a collision between a truck which he was driving north on Hellman avenue and a west-bound work train of the Pacific Electric Railway Company operated by A. V. Ringo as motorman. The accident occurred at the crossing of the railway company's single track road over Hellman avenue, a public road in San Bernardino county. Hellman avenue runs north and south and is crossed at an acute angle by the railroad track, which runs from northeast to southwest on the company's right of way, which is privately owned. The roadway on Hellman avenue approaches the railway crossing on an ascending grade of about 2 per cent. from the north and about 3½ per cent. from the south for about two hundred feet. At the time of the accident there was an earth bank about four feet high on the east side of Hellman avenue south of the crossing and on the right of way extending northeasterly along the southerly side of the tracks. On this bank, oats and weeds had grown to a height of about two feet. There was an orange orchard on private property to the southeast of Hellman avenue and the right of way so that the view of the tracks to the northeast of a traveler approaching the intersection from the south was thoroughly obscured until he had reached a point about ten feet south of the southerly rail. In approaching the crossing from the south in a truck similar to the one driven by the deceased the front wheels would have to be very close to the track before the driver could see four or five hundred feet of the tracks to his right. The usual cross-arm warning signal was maintained by the railway company north on Hellman avenue. It also maintained an electrically operated wigwag on the west side of Hellman avenue south of the crossing. This wigwag was out of order on the morning of the accident and operated continuously without regard to whether or not trains were approaching. This condition had existed for three or more days prior to the accident. The railway operated about twelve passenger trains and three freight trains traveling on regular schedule over the crossing each way every day. Deceased had passed the crossing every day, Sundays excepted, for several months, and was familiar with the conditions there existing including the defective operation of the wigwag.

On the morning of the accident two witnesses traveling south on Hellman avenue saw the wigwag working and stopped their automobile about fifty feet north of the crossing. They saw deceased approaching the crossing from a point about one hundred sixty feet south of it. He was driving his truck at a speed of not more than fifteen miles per hour, which was gradually decreased until the time of the impact. Whether or not it was moving at this time does not definitely appear. However, both witnesses were positive that he did not stop before the front of his truck was on the track or so near thereto that it was struck by the electric box car of the railway company. We conclude from the undisputed evidence of these witnesses that, while deceased may have listened for an approaching train, he could not look until he was in a position of danger on account of his obstructed view and did not stop his truck until it, or a portion of it, was in front of the approaching train. It should be noted that these witnesses heard the noise of the freight train as it approached the Hellman avenue crossing.

Under the facts which we have stated appellants maintain with every show of confidence that the judgment cannot be sustained because the evidence shows that the deceased was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law, which will defeat a recovery on the part of respondents. They rely upon the familiar rule in California that, in a case where the view of the driver of an automobile was so obstructed that he could not see a train approaching on a track intersecting his path until his automobile was in grave danger, ordinary care and prudence required him to stop, alight, and walk ahead to a point where he could see down the tracks before he proceeded onto the crossing. Respondents seek to escape the rigors of this rule in the instant case by applying an exception to it which finds authority in other jurisdictions, but which has not been considered in any of the appellate courts in this state. They rely upon this rule, which we may summarize as follows: That where the driver of a vehicle on a public highway sees a train running on a regular schedule over a single track road pass in front of him, and then proceeds upon his way and is struck by a second train not running on a regular schedule which is following the first train very closely in point of both time and distance, an unusual circumstance is presented which removes the case from the general rule and makes the question of contributory negligence one of fact to be determined by the jury.

In the instant case it appears that the deceased came into collision with a work train of the railway company which was not running upon any schedule. It was preceded at a distance of from eleven to thirteen hundred feet by a passenger train running on regular schedule. Witnesses for respondents fixed the time elapsing between the passing of the two trains at from one to one and a half minutes. The passenger train was traveling at a speed of from fifty to fifty-five miles per hour and the work train at a speed of about forty miles per hour. Taking the distance separating the two trains as given by the witnesses for respondents and the number of feet the work train would travel in one second at forty miles per hour as furnished by the counsel for appellants and allowing for the reduced speed of the work train just before the accident, the time elapsing between the two trains passing the same point would be about thirty seconds.

There is no direct evidence in the record that the deceased saw the passenger train cross the intersection. However, the crossing was clearly visible for at least one-half a mile south on Hellman avenue. The deceased must be charged with seeing that which was plainly within his vision.

[1] The railway tracks crossing Hellman avenue were part of an interurban electric railroad connecting the cities of Los Angeles and San Bernardino. The right of way was owned by the railway company, which maintained depots for the convenience of its freight and passenger service. It maintained a regular schedule of arrival and departure of freight and passenger trains. The accident we are considering occurred outside of the limits of an incorporated city and in rural territory. Under these circumstances the duties and rights of the appellant railway company in operating its trains are similar to those of a company operating steam-propelled trains under similar circumstances. 22 Cal. Jur. 237.

[2] There is evidence in the record which would support the finding that no warning bell or whistle was sounded by the work train at a distance of at least eighty rods or less from Hellman avenue. Section 486, Civ. Code; section 390, Pen. Code. The violation of the provisions of law by a defendant from which injury follows to another is negligence per se. Benjamin v. Noonan, 207 Cal. 279, 277 P. 1045.

[3] We are of the opinion that the fact that the wigwag and crossing bell were out of order, so that they were in continuous operation regardless of whether or not a train was approaching, is of little importance in this case. The deceased must have known of the defective condition of these warning signals, as he had passed over the crossing several times during the period they were out of order. He must have known that their operation did not convey a true notice of the approach of a train, or that the track was clear. He knew that they could not be relied upon, and that he should use the same care to determine the approach of a train before attempting to cross the track that would have been required of him had there been no such warning device maintained at the crossing.

[4] It is well-settled law in California that when the driver of a vehicle approaches a railway crossing not protected by a flagman, gates, or signal devices, where his view of approaching trains is obscured and he cannot otherwise determine whether he can safely proceed, due care requires him to "stop, and get out of his automobile, and go forward on foot, to ascertain if a train is approaching." Koster v. Southern Pacific Co., 207 Cal. 753, 279 P. 788, 794. It has been repeatedly held that under these circumstances the standard of ordinary care required of a motorist is so well and clearly established that his failure to observe and follow this standard constitutes contributory negligence as a matter of law and leaves no issue to be submitted to the jury. As was said in the case of Christinger v. Southern Pacific Co., 169 Cal. 619, 149 P. 175, 177, where "the standard of conduct is so obvious as to be applicable to all persons, and the plaintiff has failed to measure up to that standard under the circumstances shown he is not entitled to have his case go to the jury."

[5] It remains for us to determine whether or not the instant case presents any new or added circumstances not appearing in those cases upon which the established rule is founded, which will release the rigor of the general rule by presenting facts not contemplated by it and thereby make the question of contributory negligence a question of fact for the jury instead of one of law for the court. The only fact suggesting itself which might accomplish this result is that of the work train, not on regular schedule, following a regular passenger train upon a single-track road at an interval of time not less than thirty or more than ninety seconds, would the fact that the regular passenger train had passed over the crossing in front of deceased and proceeded upon its way lull him into a sense of security and give him a sufficient promise of safety and assurance that another train would not follow in such a short space of time, that it would change the quantum of care required of him?

The only case directly in point to which we have been cited is McGhee v. White (C. C. A.) 66 F. 502, 504, decided by Mr. Justice Taft. The facts of this case are so exactly similar to those of the instant case that it would seem a waste of space to set them out here. The court said: "The work train had passed over the crossing not more than one and a half minutes before Kennedy was struck, and he had good reason to believe, therefore, that another train was not following within so short a time and distance. The shortness of time between the two trains * * * would indicate a distance of not more than a sixth or a seventh of a mile between the two trains, running at 20 miles an hour. This is very much less than the usual distance between trains running in the same direction, and is most dangerous. Kennedy might, therefore, reasonably presume that, in the 40 yards he had to go to reach the track, another train would not pass the crossing. At least, this circumstance prevents us from holding as a matter of law that his failure to look was contributory negligence."

There are many cases decided in other states which recognize the rule of contributory negligence in not stopping, looking, and listening at railroad crossings where the view is obstructed, in which the reasoning used lends support to the exception to the rule recognized in the McGhee Case.

In the case of Bonnell v. D., L. & W. R. R. Co., 39 N. J. Law, 189, the driver of a vehicle upon a highway, on approaching a crossing, saw to his right the rear of a train headed away from him. Without doing anything further for his own safety he proceeded upon his way, and was injured at the crossing by the train backing into him. In deciding the case, the court said: "But the plaintiff had looked when about one hundred yards from the crossing, and saw, as he supposed, a train going in the opposite direction, with the rear towards him. He was not required, by any legal rule, to look continually until he crossed the track. A man of prudence might have received a fixed impression, from the appearance of the train, that it was going away from the station. * * * He saw Fancher's wagon crossing just before him, and this circumstance was likely to confirm his belief that there was no train near. It was for the jury to weigh all these facts, and say whether his mistake and consequent feeling of security were unreasonable, and manifested a want of proper care. * * * There were inferences to be drawn from all the facts of this case, upon the question of contributory negligence, which were proper for the jury."

In the case of Duame v. Chicago & N. W. Ry. Co., 72 Wis. 523, 40 N. W. 394, 7 Am. St. Rep. 879, the court used the following language: "The train, which consisted of the locomotive, two box cars, and a caboose, had come out on the main tracks from one of the side tracks, and run north across the street; and, when it had passed about two or three car-lengths north of the street, it stopped, and immediately backed down towards the street. * * * There was no flag-man at this crossing, and no one on the rear end of the train, to give warning to those about to cross the track at that place, and whether the bell was rung was a fact in dispute; witnesses for the defendant testifying that it was, and other witnesses testifying that they did not hear it. The deceased, in a one-horse vehicle, was driving west on Main street, towards his home, about seven miles in the country; and had approached within seven or eight rods of the crossing from the east, when the train passed over it, and went on north, out of his sight, and he continued on a trot towards the crossing, and, as his horse stepped on the track, the rear car of the train was very near it, and whether he attempted to back or turn around or pass over the evidence is uncertain, but his carriage came in contact with the rear car, and he was thrown under its wheels, and killed. * * * The evidence tending to prove the negligence of the employees of the defendant is very strong, if not conclusive; and we infer, therefore, that the court directed the verdict on the ground of the contributory negligence of the deceased. * * * As a general rule, and unaffected by other circumstances, the proposition urged in the brief of the learned counsel of the respondent, that one approaching a railroad crossing who may, by looking, have a timely view of an approaching train, is bound to look and listen for its approach, before attempting to cross the track, and that a failure to do so is negligence, may be correct, and the circuit court most probably applied this strict rule to the plaintiff's case. We do not think that such a rule would be applicable to this case. There is a most important fact in this case, that materially modifies this strict rule, and makes it inapplicable, and that is that this train had just passed this crossing while the deceased was within a few rods of it and driving upon a trot, and had passed on out of his sight, and he had reason to suppose that it would continue on, it being upon the main track, like any other train upon its regular route, and had no reason to suppose that it would immediately return. The presumption was that it would go on, and not return. He was thus thrown off his guard. * * * He was entrapped by this unexpected return of the train, for its sudden return over the crossing without warning was to him a trap."

The case of Palmer v. Detroit, etc., Co., 56 Mich. 1, 22 N. W. 88, also recognizes the exception to the general rule. The railroad track ran north and south, crossed by a street at right angles. Plaintiff was proceeding west on the street and saw an engine and tender going north over the crossing. When it passed he proceeded onto the crossing, watching for trains from the south, but not the north. He was injured by the engine and tender backing onto the crossing from the north, which he did not see until too late to avoid injury. It was held that under the circumstances contributory negligence was a question of fact for the jury.

In the case of Chicago & E. I. R. Co. v. Hedges, 105 Ind. 398, 7 N. E. 801, 805, the engine and tender of a train passed over a crossing followed closely by several cars which caused the injury complained of. In holding that the question of contributory negligence was one for the jury, the court said: "The interval of time between the passing of the engine and the coming of the train might, under the evidence, have been found by the jury to have been very short; and considering this fact in connection with the evidence that the whistle was sounded as the engine approached; that the bell was rung as the engine passed; that the cars, only six feet in height, came on without signal; that the view was obstructed; and that the intestate had no knowledge of the time of the train—the jury might conclude that the attention of the intestate was diverted, so that, without negligence on his part, he, for this reason, did not see the train in time to escape; that his conduct was influenced by the defendant's negligent acts, and he was thus thrown off his guard, so that without his having acted otherwise than as might have been excusable in a prudent man, under the circumstances, he was run down. Where the conduct of the defendant was plainly negligent and caused the injury, and there is dispute or doubt as to the negligence of the plaintiff, the conclusion of one man, though learned in the law, should not be forced upon 12 men sworn to try the facts. If there was any evidence tending to show that the plaintiff's intestate was thrown off his guard by such means as might have such effect upon an ordinary prudent man—and we think there was some such evidence—it was not wrong to submit to the jury the question of contributory negligence."

In the case of York v. Maine Central Ry. Co., 84 Me. 117, 24 A. 790, 792, 18 L. R. A. 60, the court said: "But sometimes there may be indications that nothing will pass along the railroad for some minutes at least. The gates (where there are gates) may be up,—a standing assurance to the traveler that no cars or engines are coming. Hooper v. Railroad Co., 81 Me. 260, 17 A. 64. The retiring of a flagman from the crossing may inform the traveler that he may now cross safely. In view of the well-known and necessary rule requiring considerable space and time between successive trains, the passage of one train may be an indication that no other will pass the same way for some minutes. These and other acts upon the part of the railroad may throw the usually prudent traveler off his guard, and free him from the reproach of negligence in attempting to cross at such a time."

Other cases which lend support to the exception we are considering are Bowen v. N. Y. Central Ry. Co., 89 Hun, 594, 35 N. Y. S. 540; Phillips v. Milwaukee, etc., Co., 77 Wis. 349, 46 N. W. 543, 9 L. R. A. 521; French v. Taunton, etc., Co., 116 Mass. 537; and Scott v. St. Louis, etc., Ry. Co., 79 Ark. 137, 95 S. W. 490, 116 Am. St. Rep. 67, 9 Ann. Cas. 212. The following cases do not recognize the exception to the general rule that one must stop and look and listen before entering upon a railway crossing or be adjudged guilty of contributory negligence. Bush v. Union Pacific Ry. Co., 62 Kan. 709, 64 P. 624; Long v. Pacific, etc., Ry. Co., 74 Or. 502, 144 P. 462, 145 P. 1068, L. R. A. 1915F, 1151; and Durbin v. O. R. & N. Co., 17 Or. 5, 17 P. 5, 11 Am. St. Rep. 778.

The rule that one approaching an unguarded railroad crossing where his view is obstructed must stop, look, and listen or be found guilty of contributory negligence is based upon the fact that the law has established a rule of conduct which the ordinarily prudent person must follow under given and fixed circumstances. Where different circumstances are presented, the reason for the rule fails. We believe that the passing of the passenger train in front of Lindsey was a sufficient indication to him that the tracks would remain clear for more than ninety seconds, so that the quantum of care required of him as a reasonably prudent man before proceeding onto the tracks was a question of fact to be determined by the jury.

In the case of Herbert v. Southern Pacific Co., 121 Cal. 227, 53 P. 651, the court said: "The rule is that negligence is a question of fact for the jury, even when there is no conflict in the evidence, if different conclusions upon the subject can be rationally drawn from the evidence. This proposition has been frequently declared by this court. [Citing cases.] The rule is general, and appellant presents a very long list of cases in which the rule has been stated. The effect of all is the same. If but one conclusion can reasonably be reached from the evidence, it is a question of law for the court; but if one sensible and impartial man might decide that the plaintiff had exercised ordinary care, and another equally sensible and impartial man that he had not exercised such care, it must be left to the jury. McKune v. Santa Clara Co., 110 Cal. 480, 42 P. 980." Seller v. Market-Street Ry. Co., 139 Cal. 268, 72 P. 1006; Hoff v. Los Angeles Pacific Co., 158 Cal. 596, 112 P. 53; Gregg v. Western Pacific Co., 193 Cal. 212, 223 P. 553.

The following reasoning used in the case of Vaca v. Southern Pacific Co., 91 Cal. App. 470, 287 P. 346, 349, is pertinent: "While a traveler about to cross a railroad track is generally charged with the duty of stopping and looking before crossing the tracks, in each particular case his discharge of that duty and his care or negligence is to be measured in the light of surrounding conditions and circumstances. It is true that he may not seek redress for an injury caused solely through his own carelessness, but in measuring his conduct a jury may take into consideration that the railroad company has created a condition which has caused the traveler to relax his own vigilance so that he is brought to his destruction or injury. Scott v. San Bernardino Valley Co., 152 Cal. 610, 93 P. 677; Runnels v. United Railroads, 175 Cal. 528, 166 P. 18. It is only when the evidence is such that the court is impelled to say that it is not in conflict on the facts and that from these facts reasonable men can draw but one inference, and that an inference pointing unerringly to the negligence of the plaintiff contributing to his own injury, that the law steps in and forbids the plaintiff a recovery. Zibbell v. Southern Pacific Co., 160 Cal. 237, 240, 116 P. 513. In Smith v. Southern Pacific Co., 201 Cal. 57, 255 P. 500, the court uses this language: 'The rights and obligations of all persons using a public street are, in this respect, reciprocal. Each may rightfully expect that the other will, at the proper time, discharge his proper duty toward others. He cannot rely wholly on the care of others, nor, on that account, neglect to use the precautions which the particular situation demands of him. But he frequently must, to some extent, depend on others in such situations, and his conduct must be considered in view of that fact in determining whether or not it is negligent. His care, or want of care, in such cases is generally a matter to be determined by the jury from all the circumstances surrounding him at the time.' See, also, Marini v. Southern Pacific Co., 201 Cal. 392, 257 P. 74, and Clark v. Bennett, 123 Cal. 275, 277, 55 P. 908."

[6] Applying these rules to the unusual facts and circumstances of this case, and having in mind the fact that the question of what would or would not constitute ordinary care on the part of deceased in approaching the crossing under these unusual facts and circumstances has not been fixed by a definite rule of law in this state, we therefore conclude that what was or was not ordinary care on his part was a question of fact properly left to the jury. The jury absolved deceased from the charge of contributory negligence. Its finding is final and cannot be disturbed by us.

[7] Appellants also attempt to predicate contributory negligence of deceased on the noise made by the work train in approaching the crossing. They argue that since this noise was heard by others it was or should have been heard by deceased and constituted sufficient warning of the approach of danger to require him to heed the warning and stop. Whether or not he heard or should have heard the noise was a question of fact for the jury. Skaggs v. Willhour (Cal. Sup.) 292 P. 649.

[8] Appellants complain of an instruction given by the trial court at the request of respondents, as follows: "Testimony of several witnesses near the crossing where deceased met his death, to the effect that they heard no whistle of the train of the Pacific Electric Railway Company which collided with the truck of the deceased, until immediately prior to the accident, is sufficient, if believed by the jury, to warrant the conclusion that no such signal was given prior to said time, and you are instructed that a failure to give due and timely warning of the approach of said train would be negligence on the part of said motorman and on the part of the Pacific Electric Railway Company."

They insist that this is an instruction on the weight and value of the evidence and therefore erroneous. In the case of Keena v. United Railroads, 197 Cal. 148, 239 P. 1061, 1063, it was said: "It is sufficient to say that the weight to be given to negative testimony often arises in railroad and other accident cases where it is claimed that signals were not given, and that in such cases, the question is purely for the jury, and it has frequently been held that negative evidence of this character is sufficient to sustain a verdict (Jones on Evidence [Horwitz], § 893, p. 400), even though it conflict with other evidence to the effect that a warning was actually given. Thompson v. Los Angeles Ry. Co., 165 Cal. 748, 134 P. 709." The case of Badostain v. Pacific Electric Ry. Co., 83 Cal. App. 290, 256 P. 576, is to the same effect.

[9, 10] The instruction told the jury in effect that, if they believed the testimony of the witnesses who did not hear the warning whistle blown or the bell rung on the work train, they might conclude that no such warnings had been given. The jury was elsewhere correctly instructed on the burden of proof; credibility of witnesses; that the jurors were the sole judges of the value and effect of the evidence and are not bound to decide in conformity with the declarations of any number of witnesses which do not produce conviction in their minds; and that the testimony of one witness entitled to full credit is sufficient for the proof of any fact if it satisfied their minds, as against the testimony of other witnesses which did not so satisfy them. Taken in connection with the other instructions, we think the effect of the instruction in question was to inform the jurors that, if the negative testimony of the witnesses who did not hear warnings given by the work train produced conviction of its truth in their minds, it would be sufficient to support the finding that such warnings had not been given. Appellants further complain of this instruction because of the use of the phrase therein, in referring to a warning whistle, of "immediately prior to the accident." They contend that this phrase is indefinite as to time and might be construed to refer to a whistle which the trainmen testified was sounded when the work train was about eight hundred feet northeasterly from the place of the accident. The word "immediately" is one of common use, the meaning of which is well understood. In Webster's International Dictionary it is defined as "without interval of time; without delay; straightway; instantly; at once." In Funk & Wagnalls Standard Dictionary it is defined as "without lapse of time; instantly; at once; without the intervention of anything." In the case of Newkirk v. Gross, 203 Ill. App. 79, when this word was used in an instruction, it was held to mean "instantly, directly, without delay, forthwith," and that its use could not have misled the jury. Where a word of common import is used in an instruction, the jury must be held to have understood it and applied to it its usual and ordinary meaning. We do not believe the use of this phrase could have misled the jury. While the verbiage of the instruction might have been improved upon, we conclude that, when it is considered with the other instructions, no prejudicial error followed from its being given to the jury.

[11] Appellants also complain of an instruction given at the request of respondents as follows: "If the jury find from the evidence that the signal bell maintained at the crossing at the intersection of Hellman avenue with the tracks of the Pacific Electric Railway Company was out of order so that it rang continuously and had been ringing continuously for several days prior to the collision, whether a train was near the crossing or not, and that deceased used said crossing frequently while said bell was thus out of repair and that he knew of the bell's unreliability, then you are instructed that the ringing of said signal bell, or wig-wag bell, at and immediately prior to the attempt of the deceased to cross the track of the defendant Pacific Electric Railway Company, was no notice to him of the approach of the work-train which later collided with his truck."

They contend that this instruction was on the facts and invaded the province of the jury. The court told the jury in this instruction that, if the bell was out of order so that it rang continuously for several days without regard to approaching trains, and this fact was known to deceased, it gave him no warning of the approach of a train. This instruction gave no rule of law to the jury. That the ringing of the defective bell gave no warning to deceased was a deduction or conclusion drawn from the facts given in the balance of the instruction. Whether or not these facts were established by the evidence was correctly left to the jury. The conclusion to be drawn from them also should have been left to the jury. However, we fail to see how any other conclusion could have been drawn from these facts by one of average intelligence. The instruction merely stated a logical and obvious conclusion—"a mere commonplace within the general knowledge of jurors; and we do not think that either the giving or the refusing of such an instruction would warrant a reversal." Kauffman v. Maier, 94 Cal. 269, 29 P. 481, 18 L. R. A. 124; Hirshfeld v. Dana, 193 Cal. 142, 223 P. 451, 457.

[12-14] Appellants complain of the ruling of the court in permitting Elbert Lindsey, son, and Lillian E. Lindsey, widow, of deceased, over their objection, to testify to the habit of deceased when about to cross a railroad track. When Elbert Lindsey was on the witness stand the following occurred:

"(Q.) By Mr. Wiseman: Are you familiar with the habits of your father as to stopping and looking and listening at railroad crossings?

"Mr. Morris: I object to that as not in rebuttal, incompetent, irrelevant and immaterial.

"The Court: The objection is overruled.

"(A.) Yes sir.

"(Q.) What were his habits in that regard?

"Mr. Morris: Objected to as irrelevant and immaterial and incompetent. There is evidence here of what was done on this occasion.

"The Court: The objection is overruled.

"(A.) He would always stop and listen and look."

During the testimony of Mrs. Lindsey the following occurred:

"(Q.) Are you familiar with his habits, regarding his habits at railroad crossings? (A.) I am.

"Mr. Morris: I object to that as incompetent, irrelevant and immaterial, because the evidence shows that there were eye-witnesses to the accident.

"The Court: Objection overruled.

"(A.) He was very strict; he stopped, looked and listened."

It must be conceded that these rulings of the court were erroneous.

The evidence is open to objection on two grounds: First, because it is too general, and, second, because there were two eyewitnesses to the accident. When admissible, evidence of the habit of deceased should have been limited to habit at the place of the accident. Evidence at another place and under different circumstances has been held too remote. Blackford v. Beckworth, 90 Cal. App. 37, 265 P. 514. Evidence of habit is not admissible where there are eyewitnesses to an accident. The dicta in the case of Wallis v. Southern Pacific Co., 184 Cal. 662, 195 P. 408, 15 A. L. R. 117, upon which the trial court seemed to have based its ruling in admitting this evidence, has not been followed in later cases. The admission of this class of evidence is now limited to cases where there are no eyewitnesses to the accident. Starr v. Los Angeles Ry. Corp., 187 Cal. 270, 201 P. 599; Chappell v. San Diego, etc., Co., 201 Cal. 560, 258 P. 73; People v. Crossan, 87 Cal. App. 5, 261 P. 531; Blackford v. Beckworth, supra; Gorman v. County of Sacramento, 92 Cal. App. 656, 268 P. 1083.

We have quoted all of the evidence in the record concerning the habit of deceased in stopping before crossing a railroad. As we have observed, two witnesses testified he did not stop, and no witness contradicted this evidence. After reading the record we have concluded that the deceased did not stop. The jurors are presumed to be reasonable human beings subject to reasonable mental reactions. We cannot see how a reasonable person would give the slight evidence of habit appearing in the record any serious consideration in view of the positive testimony of two witnesses that deceased did not stop before going on the tracks before the collision. We therefore conclude that under the facts and circumstances of the instant case, the admission of this evidence was not prejudicial error. While the evidence is sharply conflicting, there is sufficient material evidence in the record to support the conclusion that the warning signals required by law to be sounded by a train approaching a street crossing were not given on the work train. This established negligence on the part of appellants, which the jury found was the proximate cause of the injury to deceased. Under the peculiar circumstances of this case we hold that the question of the contributory negligence of deceased was properly left to the jury. The verdict resolved this question against appellants. While there were technical errors of law committed in the giving of an instruction and in rulings on the admission of evidence, we do not consider them sufficiently prejudicial to warrant a reversal of the judgment.

Judgment affirmed.

CITY OF BEVERLY HILLS v. ANGER et al.
Civ. 7297.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 1, California.

Dec. 24, 1930.

Rehearing Denied Jan. 19, 1931. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 19, 1931.

1. Eminent domain ⇨262(4).

Jury's only duty was to find, as accurately as evidence permitted, market value as of date of condemnation for park.

2. Eminent domain ⇨222(4).

Instructions that, if property restricted to residence uses could not be profitably used therefor, jury could presume city council would change zoning ordinance held erroneous.

Such instructions on issue of value of land taken were erroneous because there could be no legal presumption that city council would cause realty to be zoned for income producing purposes, but at most presumption would be that council might, in exercise of its discretion, modify zoning ordinance to permit property zoned for residence purposes to be used for business and other income producing purposes.

3. Eminent domain ⇨222(4).

Instruction that, if property could not be properly used for residential purposes, deed restrictions to such purposes were ineffective, held erroneous.

Such instruction relating to value of land taken was erroneous, because, though circumstances might arise in which equity would not aid grantor in enforcing restriction of property to residence uses, it did not necessarily follow that terms of deed relating thereto were without legal force or effect, and it was also erroneous because there was no evidence sustaining assumption.

4. Eminent domain ⇨262(5).

Erroneous instructions respecting presumption of change in zoning of property taken for park and enforceability of restrictions held not prejudicial to city.

Such erroneous instructions were not prejudicial, in view of other correct instructions respecting city's power to change zoning ordinances, and in view of amount of verdict for property taken.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Elliot Craig, Judge.

Action by the City of Beverly Hills against Arthur Anger, A. F. Farrow and others, to acquire land for public park purposes. From a judgment for defendant last named and certain other defendants, plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Richard C. Waltz, of Beverly Hills, and Hill, Morgan & Bledsoe, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Meserve, Mumper, Hughes & Robertson, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CONREY, P. J.

In this action, brought to acquire land for public park purposes, it was found that respondents were the owners of a part of the land sought to be taken. This land of respondents is known in the record as parcel 10, and is a lot having a frontage of 80 feet on Palm avenue and 150 feet on Santa Monica boulevard in the city of Beverly Hills. By verdict of a jury the market value of parcel 10 was determined to be the sum of $18,000. Accordingly, that amount was awarded to respondents.

The plaintiff, in presenting its appeal from the judgment, contends that the court erroneously gave to the jury certain instructions, by reason whereof the jury was led to appraise at an unduly high market value the said parcel 10; in other words, that there was prejudicial error, amounting to a miscarriage of justice.

Parcel No. 10 was included within a subdivision of lands which, in the conveyances to lot purchasers, were made subject to certain restrictions designed to limit the use of the property to use for single family residences. These restrictions had not been released by any party to the records of title. Parcel No. 10 was also within territory which, by a city ordinance of December 4, 1922, had been placed within a residential zone.

The instructions to which appellant takes exception are these:

(a) "If you find from the evidence in this case that the property herein in question cannot be beneficially used or sold for single residence purposes, but that the same, by reason of change in conditions, has become usable and valuable only for income purposes, such as apartments, hotels and/or business, then you are to presume that the city council in due and proper time will so change and modify the zoning ordinances of the city of Beverly Hills covering this property that the same will be zoned for such income producing purposes."

(b) "It is not the policy of the law to so zone property or territory as to prohibit the use or the sale thereof, and the law presumes that if and when changes take place that render the property not usable or unsalable for the purposes for which the same is sold, the authorities in due and proper time will so change such zoning ordinances as to let the property be used or developed and sold for the purposes for which it can be beneficially used and sold."

(c) "If you find from the evidence in this case that the property in question, by reason of changes, if any, that have taken place since the same was conveyed by the Rodeo Land & Water Company, has ceased to be single residential property, and that the same cannot be sold for that purpose or properly used for that purpose, then and in such event you are instructed that the restrictions contained in the original deed are no longer of any force or effect."

Appellant contends that there was no evidence tending to prove any of the facts which were the assumed basis of these several instructions. However, we need not go into that question very far. Let it be assumed that there was some evidence from which the jury might have found the facts to which the court referred in the instructions. Even so, was the law correctly stated?

[1] The only duty imposed upon the jury was to find and declare, as accurately as the evidence would permit, the market value of parcel 10, as of the date April 21, 1928. The existence of the restrictions to which we have referred had been proved. The fact that the land had been conveyed subject to the stated restrictions would have an influence (varying according to circumstances) upon the market value. The same observation applies to zoning ordinances. Respondents attempted to prove, by the testimony of witnesses, that parcel 10 had a high market value, partly due to a prospective or possible use for business purposes, which would require and cause a release of the existing restrictions which had confined the property to residence uses. Witnesses produced by the city testified to lower market values, and gave less weight to possible future use of the land for business purposes. It was, however, singly and only, the market value of the land as of the stated time that the jury was expected to ascertain and declare, in accordance with the evidence.

The instructions to which appellant has excepted do not have direct relation to the principal question presented to the jury. They relate to conditions, and changes in condition, of the property, which might lead to changes of legal status, which in turn, if they did occur, and if they became generally known, might tend to establish for the property a higher market value. And it could be claimed, at least with some plausibility that on the 21st day of April, 1928, already the prophetic minds of dealers in real property in the city of Beverly Hills were looking forward to that happy day when the trees and shrubs on parcel 10 would give way for apartment houses, hotels, and other business houses.

[2] We are of the opinion that the instruction (a) was erroneous in this, that there could be no presumption of law that for the reasons stated in the instruction the city council will cause the said real property to be zoned for "such income producing purposes." The utmost length of this instruction should have been that, in view of the supposed changes of conditions, the city council in the exercise of its discretion might modify, as indicated, its zoning ordinance, and that in estimating the market value the jury might consider this possible change of the ordinance and the reasonable influence on market value, of such possibility.

The foregoing observations apply, in similar manner, to instruction (b).

[3] Instruction (c) told the jury in effect that if, since the deed restrictions were placed upon parcel 10, such changes have occurred that the property cannot be sold as residential property, or properly used for that purpose, then the restrictions contained in the original deed "are no longer of any force or effect." We think that appellants are right in their claim that there is no evidence to sustain the finding assumed by this instruction, at least in this, that there is no evidence that this property could not properly be used for residential purposes. While circumstances might arise, such that equity would not aid the grantor in enforcing the restrictions, it does not necessarily follow that the terms of the deed relating thereto are of no legal force or effect. Strong v. Shatto, 45 Cal. App. 29, 37, 187 P. 159. The instructions, furthermore, failed to point out any relation of the stated legal proposition to the question of market value of the land, as of the date April 21, 1928, or at all.

[4] The question remains whether the particular instructions to which exception is taken, when read together with all of the instructions given, were, by reason of the errors assigned, so far prejudicial that they probably caused the jury to award to respondents a compensation substantially greater than otherwise would have been obtained. We are of the opinion that there was no such consequence. The jury was fairly and fully instructed upon the rules for determining market value and the rules for weighing the evidence relating thereto. Touching particularly upon the zoning ordinance and the deed restrictions, the court said:

"All zoning ordinances in the city of Beverly Hills can be repealed or modified or otherwise changed at any time by the city council of the city of Beverly Hills, subject to referendum by the people; that is, the registered voters of Beverly Hills.

"The deed restrictions placed by the Rodeo Land & Water Company against the property in question can be removed, modified or otherwise changed, at any time, by the consent of the owners thereof, with the consent of the Rodeo Land & Water Company."

The testimony of witnesses, qualified to give opinions upon market value of this property, fixed that value at prices varying from $28,000 to $9,240. This jury was instructed that it must not "strike an average" by computation, but must decide according to the weight of the evidence in the case, and there is no reason to doubt that it endeavored to obey this instruction. An examination of the record indicates that the verdict is one which fairly represents the reasonable result of the evidence.

The judgment is affirmed.

DELOREY v. BOARD OF PUBLIC WORKS OF LOS ANGELES et al.

Civ. 7183.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 2, California.

Dec. 12, 1930.

Rehearing Denied Jan. 9, 1931. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 9, 1931.1. Municipal corporations ⇨158.

Cause must be shown for removal of appointive officers of Los Angeles serving under civil service, although term of office is not fixed (St. 1925, p. 1028).

2. Municipal corporations ⇨178.

Mayor of Los Angeles could remove member of board of public works without cause, subject to assent of council (St. 1925, pp. 1056, 1099, §§ 72, 73, 230).

The mayor had right to remove member of board of public works without cause as against contention that, as member was appointed for term of five years and the power of removal given by Los Angeles City Charter (St. 1925, p. 1028) contained no provision that it might be exercised without cause, it was necessarily implied that removal should be only for cause after notice and hearing, since the term of the board member under section 72 (page 1056), was for five years except as otherwise provided, and it was otherwise provided in section 73 (page 1056) that the member might be removed by the mayor, subject to approval of council.

3. Municipal corporations ⇨154.

That mayor of Los Angeles could exercise improperly power to remove member of municipal boards did not justify judicial legislation to require mayor to show cause for removal.

4. Municipal corporations ⇨178.

Member of board of public works of Los Angeles, removed by mayor, was entitled to compensation until council approved removal
(St. 1925, pp. 1056, 1099, §§ 72, 73, 230).

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Henry G. Jorgensen, Judge.

Action by E. J. Delorey against the board of Public Works of the City of Los Angeles and others. From a judgment denying a writ of mandate, plaintiff appeals.

Modified, and, as so modified, affirmed.

Hearing denied by Supreme Court; LANG-DON, J., dissenting.

Hill, Morgan & Bledsoe, Charles P. McCarthy, L. E. Whitehead, and E. H. Delorey, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Hewitt, McCormick & Crump, Leslie R.
Hewitt, Frank W. Stafford, and Frank M.
Smith, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

ARCHBALD, Justice pro tem.

This is an appeal from a judgment in the court below discharging an alternative writ of mandate theretofore issued on application of the plaintiff and denying the petition for a peremptory writ.

July 1, 1928, appellant was appointed a member of the board of public works of Los Angeles for a five-year term and as such member drew a salary of $500 per month, payable semimonthly. On September 16, 1929, John C. Porter, the mayor of Los Angeles, notified appellant in writing that he had that day removed him from office as such member of the board of public works subject to the assent of the city council. Thereafter, and on the 27th of September, the city council by an aye and no vote of ten to four assented to such action of the mayor. It was to compel the making and certifying of a salary claim for the last half of said month of September that appellant brought the action in the court below, and, from a judgment in favor of respondents, this appeal is taken.

It is appellant's contention that his term was fixed by law at five years, and that, the power of removal given by the charter containing no provision that it may be exercised without cause, notice, or hearing, it is necessarily implied that removal shall be only for cause, after notice and hearing; that, having been taken without notice, hearing or cause, the action of the mayor and council was invalid and appellant remained a member of the board of public works, entitled to his salary; and that the court erred in not so finding and adjudging. No case has been found where this particular charter provision has been construed, but counsel have cited numerous authorities from other jurisdictions to sustain their respective positions. Typical in a general way as to one class of cases cited is that of Hallgren v. Campbell, 82 Mich. 255, 46
N. W. 381, 383, 9 L. R. A. 408, 21 Am. St. Rep.
557, involving a street commissioner of the city of Menominee, Mich., who had been appointed for the term of one year. The city council, prior to the expiration of the term, adopted a resolution providing that such commissioner "be and he is hereby removed from office" and declaring said office vacant. No notice was given the commissioner of the charges against him. Section 3 of the charter authorized the appointment by the city council of several officers, among them the street commissioners. Section 5 fixed the term of such commissioners, as well as other officers, at one year. Section 17 provided: "Any person appointed to office by the council by authority of this act may be removed therefrom by a vote of the majority of the aldermen elect. * * * In case of elective officers provision shall be made by ordinance for preferring charges, and trying the same, and no removal of an elective officer shall be made unless a charge in writing is preferred and an opportunity given to make a defense thereto." It was claimed that, because the section last quoted provided that elective officers could not be removed except for cause, the Legislature intended that appointive officers might be removed without cause. The court said: "In such a case the legislature may by express words confer upon the common council of a city the power to remove an officer without cause; but in the absence of such power given in express words the presumption must be that the legislature intended that every officer appointed for a fixed period should be entitled to hold his office until the expiration of such period unless removed therefrom for cause after a fair trial." It is true that section 3 of the charter referred to also provided for the removal of certain officers at pleasure, naming, them, but it did not include the street commissioner, although the same section provided for his appointment as well as that of other officers named. Other general classes of cases cited are where the statute or charter fixes the term of office and no power of removal is given the appointing officer or body (People v. Jewett, 6 Cal. 291; Page v. Hardin, 8 B. Mon. [Ky.] 648; State v. Kuehn, 34 Wis. 229), and where the term is fixed by one section of the charter and the power to remove for cause is given by another (Matter of Carter, 141 Cal. 316, 74 P. 997, 998; Bannerman v. Boyle, 160 Cal. 197, 116 P. 732).

The case of Matter of Carter, supra, involved the charter of the city of San Diego, which provided as follows, the italics being ours: "The mayor shall appoint all officers whose election or appointment is not otherwise specially provided for in this charter or by law. He shall have power to remove for cause any person holding office by his nomination or appointment, and in case of such removal shall give written notice thereof, stating the cause, to the person removed, and shall immediately notify the common council of his action and the reasons therefor." Charter of San Diego, art. 3, § 7, Stats. 1889, p. 661. The court held that the mayor was not exercising a judicial function under the language quoted, as the notices to be given were after the removal and merely for the purpose of informing the officer of the reasons for removal and of making a record.

In the case of Bannerman v. Boyle, supra, the charter of the city of San Francisco was under consideration. Bannerman was appointed by the mayor in 1909 as a member of the board of education to fill an unexpired term ending January 8, 1911. Without any notice or hearing, the mayor, on February 1, 1910, removed or attempted to remove him from office and appointed one Power to fill the vacancy assumed to have been so created. Bannerman refused to vacate the office, and denied the validity of the act of removal. The charter of San Francisco in effect then (Stats. 1899, p. 241-367) provided in section 1 of chapter 1 of article 7 (page 317) that such board should consist of four directors appointed by the mayor for a term of four years, so classified that the term of one of them expired each year. Section 18 of article 16 (page 361) provided that any appointed officer might be removed by the mayor for cause. Speaking on the question of removal from office, the court says, at page 205 (of 160 Cal., 116 P. 732, 735) of the opinion: "Upon this question the great weight of authority is to the effect that where an officer is appointed for a fixed term and it is provided that he may be removed during the term 'for cause,' without other qualifying words, such removal cannot be made except after notice and a hearing."

The case of State v. Brown, 57 Mo. App. 199, is in the same general class as that of Hallgren v. Campbell, supra, and the court in commenting on the reason for the rule says: "It is fixity of tenure that destroys the power of removal at pleasure otherwise incident to the appointing power. State v. Police Commissioners, 14 Mo. App. 302. The reason of this rule is the evident repugnance between the fixed term and the power of arbitrary removal. The effect of this rule is, that the right to hold during a fixed term can only be overcome by an express grant of power to remove at pleasure. An inferential authority to remove at pleasure cannot be deduced, since the existence of a defined term, ipso facto, negatives such an inference, and implies a contrary presumption, i. e., that the incumbent shall hold to the end of his term, subject to removal for cause."

It is to be noted that, in all of the cases of the general classes mentioned, the terms of office are fixed in one section of the charter or other law, without any reservation of the right of removal, and the power to remove is given in another section. This brings us to the consideration of another class of cases where the tenure of office by the very terms of its creation is subject to the power of removal. In Sweeney v. Stevens, 46 N. J. Law, 344, a jailer who had been appointed by the board of freeholders for a five-year term was by the affirmative votes of two-thirds of the members removed from office before the expiration of the term. The statute under which both acts were taken reads: "* * * The board of freeholders shall appoint some proper person to be the jailer or keeper of the jail of said county, who shall hold his office for the term of five years, and until another be appointed in his stead; but such jailer may at any time be removed from office, by a vote of two-thirds of all the chosen freeholders of the said county, for the time being." The court, in speaking of such section, said: "This language is plain, and seems clearly to authorize the removal of the defendant in the mode in which it has been attempted. We have been referred to no judicial decision, and are aware of none, which would justify our engrafting upon it any provisions to defeat the power that it appears to confer. The legislature, in creating the office, had the right to provide for its vacation in such manner as they saw fit, and in ascertaining what the manner is, we must take their language in its ordinary import."

In State v. Somers, 35 Neb. 322, 53 N. W. 146, the commissioner of health of the city of Omaha was removed from office before the expiration of the two years for which he was appointed. The section under which he was appointed, so far as material to his office, reads: "Said commissioner of health shall be appointed by the mayor, subject to the approval of a majority of the council, shall hold office for a two years from date of appointment, unless sooner removed or retired." The officer so removed brought a quo warranto proceeding to determine the right of the defendant, appointed in his place, to the office. The writ was denied, and the action dismissed; the court using the following language: "An examination of the several sections of the act shows that certain officers, like the board of public works, consisting of three members, are appointed for one, two, and three years, and there is a provision for filing specific charges against each of the members of such board, and removing the person adjudged to be guilty. Where an office is held in that way, there can be no removal except for cause. Where, however, the right of removal is reserved in the appointing power, without the necessity of making charges, it may be exercised in the discretion of the appointing power, even before the expiration of the term."

In the case of Commonwealth v. Harriman, 134 Mass. 314, an information in the nature of a quo warranto was filed by the Attorney General at the relation of Joseph M. Day to try the title to the office of judge of probate and insolvency for the county of Barstable. The relator was appointed to the office in 1858 to hold the office during the term of his good behavior therein, "unless sooner removed" in the manner prescribed by the Constitution. He was removed from office in 1882 by the Governor of the state, with the consent of the council, upon the address of both houses of the Legislature, and the defendant was appointed in his place. The language of the Constitution under which he was appointed and removed, so far applicable, is as follows: "All judicial officers, duly appointed, commissioned and sworn, shall hold their offices during good behavior, excepting such concerning whom there is different provision made in this Constitution: provided nevertheless, the Governor, with consent of the Council, may remove them upon the address of both houses."

es." Const. Mass., c. 3, art. 1. It was contended by the relator that the only effect of the proviso was to give the power of removal by address for causes not covered by the provision of the Constitution for impeachment. In regard to this contention, the court said: "We are not able to see any just rule of construction by which we can thus limit and qualify the plain language of the proviso. The language is broad and general; in its terms it includes a removal for any cause which is deemed by the legislature and executive departments sufficient. If it had been intended to exclude from this provision the power to remove for misconduct in office, leaving that to be dealt with by impeachment exclusively, it would have been so stated. Neither this article nor the article on impeachment contains any indication that the power of impeachment was to exclude the power of removal by address. We must give to the proviso the broad meaning which its language imports. The article reaffirms the great principle asserted in the Declaration of Rights, that judicial officers shall hold their offices during good behavior; but it was deemed wise, as a check upon the absolute power and independence of the judicial department, to confide in the other two coordinate branches of the government the exceptional power of removing judicial officers by address when an exigency requires it, of which, from the nature of the case, they must be the sole judges. The obvious and natural meaning of the language used seems to us to require this construction, and our view is confirmed by the history of this provision." The court reinforces its conclusion by going into the history of the adoption of the amendment of the Constitution, which showed that the convention refused to adopt a proviso in practically the language quoted, but did adopt an amendment providing that no address for the removal of any judicial officer should pass either house of the Legislature until the causes of such removal were first stated and entered in the journal and served on the officer charged, "so that he may be admitted to a hearing in his defense in both houses." Such amendment, however, was rejected by the people. The court, on page 328 (of 134 Mass.) of its opinion, uses this further and very significant language: "The relator strongly contends that, upon this construction of the Constitution, the tenure of judicial office is not during good behavior, but at the will of the other departments of the government. It seems to us that this is arguing against the existence of a power clearly conferred, from the fact that it may be abused and perverted. There is no more danger of the abuse of the power of removal, if it includes the right to remove for impeachable offences, than there would be if it were confined, as the relator contends it should be, to cases of physical, mental or moral disability of a judicial officer, of which necessarily the removing power must be the sole judge."

Any power may be abused. The judiciary might corruptly declare any law or body of laws to be unconstitutional and invalid, and thus encroach upon the powers of the Legislature; yet no one doubts the right and duty of the judiciary to declare invalid any law which in its judgment violates the Constitution. In confiding to the two coordinate branches of the government this important and exceptional power of removing the judiciary, the people found a sufficient protection to the substantial independence of the judicial department in the constitutional guaranties thrown around it, in the fact that the removal can only be made by the concurrent action of both houses of the Legislature and of the Governor and Council, all of whom are directly answerable to the people at frequently recurring periods, and in the trust and confidence they may rightfully repose in their servants and agents that in the exercise of any power committed to them they will act in obedience to their oaths of office, and in the spirit of the fundamental principles of the Constitution."

It is to be remembered that officers appointed during good behavior come under the same rule as to the necessity of preferring charges, etc., as those appointed for a fixed term. Mechem on Public Officers, § 454.

The case of Townsend v. Kurtz, 83 Md. 331, 34 A. 1123, was one involving the title to the office of insurance commissioner of the state. Townsend was appointed as insurance commissioner under a statute providing that such officer "shall be appointed by the governor, treasurer and comptroller for the term of four years * * * and shall hold his office during the term for which he is appointed, or until his successor is appointed and qualified, unless sooner removed by the governor, treasurer and comptroller." Townsend qualified and entered upon the duties of his office. The following March the then Governor, comptroller, and treasurer adopted a resolution removing him from office. No charges were filed against him, and he was removed without prior notice or hearing. Faced with the great conflict in the decisions on the question, the court, on page 1127 (of 34 A., 83 Md. 331) of the opinion, says: "Without attempting the hopeless task of reconciling the authorities on all the questions, there is no conflict between them on some points. When the statute has given the appointing power authority to remove the appointee, although originally appointed for a definite term of years, it can be exercised. The point of divergence between the cases is as to how the removal can be accomplished when the law granting the power is silent on the subject. On the one side it is said that in such case it must be implied that the power can only be exercised for cause which admittedly requires notice, hearing, etc., while the other line of cases refuses to permit the court to interpolate words that the legislature did not see fit to use. As we see our lawmakers have declared the various causes for which certain officers may be removed, and have thereby declared they can only be removed for cause, but have in this instance been silent on the subject, we think the safer rule to be to hold that they have thus manifested an intention not to limit the governor, treasurer, and comptroller to any particular cause or causes for removal of the insurance commissioner, and have thereby practically left it to their discretion, which, of course, must be honestly and fairly exercised."

[1] Taking up the charter of Los Angeles (Stats. 1925, p. 1028), we find that the people adopting it so framed it that out of the army of officers and employees needed to carry on the very extensive and complicated functions connected with the government of a great city they have retained the right to elect only the following: Mayor, city attorney, controller, members of the board of education and of the city council. All others are appointive, and different methods of both appointment and removal are provided. The city clerk is appointed by and "may be removed by the Mayor, subject in both appointment and removal to confirmation by the Council and to the Civil Service provisions of this charter." Section 44. The city engineer is appointed by the board of public works, and holds office "at the pleasure of the board." Section 49. The purchasing agent is appointed and may be removed by the mayor, subject in both appointment and removal to confirmation by the council and to the civil service provisions of the charter. Section 55. The treasurer is likewise appointed and removed. Section 58. The city prosecutor is appointed by the mayor, subject to confirmation by the council (section 51), but the section of the charter relating to appointment is silent on the question of removal. No terms of office are fixed for the above appointive officers, but section 11 provides that, "in case of appointive officers the appointing power shall have power of removal, except that where confirmation is required for appointment the consent of the confirming body shall be required for removal, and where the officer is appointed subject to the civil service provisions of this charter, such removal shall be in accordance therewith, except as elsewhere specifically provided in this charter." No term being fixed as to such officers, there could be no question of repugnance between tenure of office and the power of removal; but as to those under civil service rules there must be cause shown, although otherwise they would be holding at the pleasure of the appointing power.

The mayor is "the executive officer of the city and shall exercise a careful supervision over all its affairs." Section 40 (1). It is his duty annually to communicate by message to the council a general statement of the condition and affairs of the city (Section 40 (2), and it is his duty "to be vigilant and active in the enforcement of the ordinances of the city; to exercise a constant supervision over the acts and conduct of all officers and employees" (Section 40 (3). It is apparent from the foregoing that the mayor is the active and responsible head of the city government, notwithstanding the fact that, by reason of necessity, the administrative work is performed under the immediate supervision and direction of the various departments of the city, one of which is the department of public works with which we are here concerned. It is reasonable to suppose that it was the intention of the Legislature and the citizens of Los Angeles, having placed such a responsibility on the mayor, to provide him with administrative officers with whom he was satisfied, without requiring him to go to the extreme of preferring charges, notice, and hearing, etc., in order to remove them. And so the charter seems to read. Considering the fact that the appointment is made by the responsible executive head of the city government, with the approval of a majority of the council, it is probable that the character and ability of the men appointed to the important administrative boards of the city would in all cases be such that the only dissatisfaction the mayor would have with any of them would arise from a difference in views as to the policies of handling the work of the particular department. The framers of the charter undoubtedly realized and intended that in such matters the mayor should have the right at all times to have heads of departments in sympathy with his policies of administration, and, to prevent any abuse of such right, limited the power to remove an incumbent only by requiring the assent of a majority of the body concurring in the appointment. The plain language of the charter indicates such an intention, and there seems to be nothing that calls for the interpolation of words to change it.

[2] The Los Angeles City Charter, under which the appointment and removal in question here were made, provides for the establishment of a board of public works consisting of five members, and that "the members of the Board of Public Works shall be appointed and shall organize and conduct the business of the board in the manner provided in Sections 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 84 of this charter relating to citizen boards." Section 230, Stats. 1925, p. 1099. The sections of the charter above referred to relating to appointments are as follows: "Sec. 72 [page 1056]. The terms of the commissioners * * * shall be five years, except as otherwise provided in Sec. 73 * * *" "Sec. 73 [page 1056]. The members of each of the boards * * * shall be appointed, and may be removed by the Mayor, subject in both appointment and removal to the approval of the Council by a majority vote."

The term to which the members of the board are appointed is not "five years," but five years unless sooner removed by the mayor with the approval of the council. Sections 72 and 73. Such is the clear language of the two sections read together, as they must be. Section 72 says the term shall be five years except as provided in section 73, and such section provides that the members of each board "may be removed by the mayor", etc. So the term is five years if the member is not removed prior to that time in the manner provided in the section. The language of sections 72 and 73 applies to all the administrative boards for whose acts the mayor, as executive of the city, is directly responsible. It does not say removed for cause, or removed after charges preferred, but "shall be appointed and may be removed by the mayor, subject in both appointment and removal to the approval of the council by a majority vote." It is an express grant to the mayor, the responsible executive head of the city government, of the general power of removal; the only limitation being that such act is subject to the approval of the council. "The grant of a general power to remove carries with it the right to remove at any time or in any manner deemed best, with or without notice." Eckloff v. Dist. of Columbia, 135 U. S. 240, 10 S. Ct. 752, 34 L. Ed. 120. The grant of power concerning which the United States Supreme Court used such language was to "remove from office," and the court said if that was all the legislation "there would be no question," but there was a contention made that the unrestricted right of removal so given was limited by the provisions of prior statutes. Is there anything in the charter that places any additional or further limitation on the right granted here, other than the one requiring the approval of the council? It is clear that there is nothing in the section cited, unless the five-year tenure is to be so construed. In the instant case there is no repugnance between the fixed term and the power of removal, because, as we have pointed out, the fixed term is itself expressly made subject to that power; so there is no reason for adding words to language that is unequivocal.

[3] Appellant contends that the rule urged by respondents would destroy the scheme of the charter, which provides for the expiration of terms of members of the different boards at different times so that, if a new member is appointed at the expiration of each term, there would still be on the board experienced members. The answer to that is that we cannot assume that any responsible executive would so jeopardize his administration by any such foolish act; and, even though one might be so unwise, still that of itself is no reason why the courts should make the charter foolproof in that regard by judicial legislation. The remedy, if one is needed, is with the people who elect the mayor and whose charter it is.

It also is urged that, if the contention of respondents is sustained, it will mean the making of all of the officers personally subservient to the mayor, bring back the spoils system, and make the government of the city a one-man affair. The people in adopting the charter were satisfied, however, to place the responsibility on the mayor elected by them, subject only in the exercise of the power of removal, so far as the members of the various departmental boards are concerned, to the approval of a majority of the council, an independent branch of the city government whose members are themselves elected by the people; and it is not for us to assume that such officers are not interested in conscientiously executing the trust reposed in them. And, even if they were not, we could not close our eyes to the existence of a power so clearly conferred simply because it might not be exercised in the way it should.

[4] It would seem, however, that the act of removal was not complete until assented to by the council. That occurred September 27, and until then appellant was a member of the board and entitled to compensation as such. So far as the record shows, therefore, the lower court should have issued a peremptory writ of mandate to respondents to compel the payment of the salary due appellant for the intervening twelve days. In that particular the judgment of the lower court will be modified, and such court is instructed to issue a peremptory writ of mandate to the respondents board of public works of the city of Los Angeles, Hugh J. McGuire, Arthur Eldridge, A. W. L. Dunn, and James Hyde, members of said board, and Horace B. Ferris, as secretary and chief accounting employee of said board, commanding them to certify and file the salary claim of appellant for the sum of $200, being his salary from September 15 to September 27, 1929, and to respondent John S. Myers, controller of said city, commanding him to issue a pay check or warrant to pay said claim. As so modified, the judgment is affirmed.

1. Municipal corporations ☞751(1).

Where city licenses person to do act dangerous in itself or has notice that licensee acted negligently and left street in unsafe condition, city will be responsible, though not ordinarily liable for licensee's acts.

2. Municipal corporations ☞751(3).

City cannot by license abdicate powers or surrender duty, but must exercise general supervisory duty as to streets.

3. Municipal corporations ☞751(1).

City is not liable for licensee's acts unless it is negligent in respect to its own duty.

4. Municipal corporations ☞751(3).

City permitting street work by individual, must maintain supervision reasonably guarding against negligence which would leave street in dangerous condition.

5. Municipal corporations ☞839.

Knowledge of board of public works as to street work being done held equivalent to notice of dangerous condition created by proposed changes (St. 1923, p. 675).

The board of works knew that work was to be done as requested in accordance with recommendation of city engineer and knew that such recommendation did not contain provision for protecting property in ravine against damage which reasonably might have been expected to result. This was equivalent to notice of dangerous condition which would be created by proposed changes if permitted to be done without some provision for suitable drainage.

6. Municipal corporations ☞733(2).

Though street improvement is municipal affair, absence of charter provision or ordinance creating liability for negligence does not exonerate city.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles D. Ballard, Judge.

Action by Fred Mulder against the City of Los Angeles to recover damages for negligence of the defendant whereby property of the plaintiff was injured. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Hearing denied by Supreme Court; SHENK, J., dissenting.

CONREY, P. J.

From the findings of the trial court the following facts appear: The plaintiff was the owner of lot 1 in tract No. 2138, at San Pedro, in the city of Los Angeles. Lot 1 is on the south side of Third street, in the block next east of Cabrillo street. The intersection of Second and Cabrillo streets is northwesterly from plaintiff's lot, and is on ground higher than plaintiff's lot, so that the surface flow of water runs southeasterly from said Third street intersection, down through a ravine in which plaintiff's land is located. At the time of said injury, on or about March 1, 1926, and during a usual and common rain-storm, dirt, sand and debris were washed down from and off of Second street and said Second street intersection, and were deposited upon plaintiff's property, with resultant damage, so that the dwelling house of plaintiff was made uninhabitable. The destruction of plaintiff's property was caused by negligence of the defendant, in that the defendant did not properly make, keep, or maintain the public streets, and did not properly or adequately protect the same. Prior to said rain-storm the defendant city had raised and changed the grade of Second street and had made an embankment across Cabrillo street at Second, and thereby had interfered with the natural flow of storm waters, which therefore did not reach the plaintiff's land, and also by the same means of interference the defendant caused said storm waters, with their burden of dirt, sand, and debris, to be cast upon plaintiff's property.

The complaint alleged, and the answer did not deny, that Second and Cabrillo streets are public highways, and that each of them is maintained, improved, and controlled by defendant the city of Los Angeles, except that the defendant, in its separate and affirmative defense, alleged that defendant has never improved Second street at its intersection with Cabrillo. It is conceded that the work done at that place was not done by the city in connection with any formal street improvement proceeding. From the evidence on which plaintiff relies, it appears that about one year before the rainstorm of March 1, 1926, the board of public works had granted to one Butterfield permission to make certain fills, in accordance with a report and recommendation received from the city engineer. The work thus authorized included the filling of Second street at Cabrillo "an additional ten feet." The engineer's report did not recommend, and the board did not require, that, in connection with the making of this fill and embankment, any precaution or measure should be provided, to take care of the storm surface waters. The fill, as made by Butterfield, was composed of sea sand, covered with adobe. When the storm came, of March 1, 1926, the storm water collected behind said fill, accumulating until it overflowed, so that great quantities of sand and debris were carried down, filling the land below, including plaintiff's lot, and greatly damaging the plaintiff's house.

From the judgment entered awarding damages to plaintiff, defendant appeals, and contends that on the facts shown, and for six separately stated reasons, no municipal liability is cast upon it. The second and third points rest upon the assumption that the damage was caused by flooding from the natural runoff of the surface waters. But the court found, upon sufficient evidence, that the direction and quantity of the natural run-off had been disturbed and changed by the acts of the defendant. The fourth point, in substance, is that the storm of March 1, 1926, was of an extraordinary and unprecedented character which the defendant was not bound to anticipate. But the court found, on sufficient evidence, that said storm was "a usual and common rainstorm."

[1-4] The first and fifth points as stated in appellant's brief are that the city is not liable for the acts of a permittee, and that the granting of the permit by the board of public works was a tort, for which the municipality is not liable.

Article XXIII of the Charter of the City of Los Angeles provides for a department of public works, to be under the management and control of the board of public works, which board (section 231) "shall have all the powers and perform all the duties that are now or may hereafter be conferred or imposed by law upon the street superintendent." Also it is provided (section 233, subd. 1), that said board "shall have and exercise all the powers and duties possessed by the city under this charter, and all the powers and duties that are now or may hereafter be imposed by general laws of the state upon the council or any board or officer of the city under special assessment, as well as all other proceedings relating to:" (Here follow designations of sundry special proceedings concerned with contracts for public improvements of streets, crossings, public places and rights of way and property belonging to the city.) It is further provided (section 234) that "the Board of Public Works shall have charge, superintendence, and control, except as otherwise specifically provided in this charter: Of the construction and maintenance of all streets and other places and property enumerated in subdivision 1 of section 233 of this charter; of all work and improvement in, on, over or under all such streets, places and property; of the design, construction and maintenance of all sanitary and storm sewers and drains of the city, and all connections therewith." Our attention has not been directed to any exceptions provided in the charter, which would modify or prevent the application of the foregoing provisions of section 234 to the proceedings under review in this case. The board of public works was authorized to exercise on behalf of the city its power and control over these public streets and works of improvement therein. It had authority to permit street work to be done, particularly when recommended by the city engineer, not only under special assessment proceedings or city contracts for compensation, but where the same was proposed to be done without cost to the city or adjacent property owners. But in such case we are of the opinion that the duty of the city to make reasonable provision against damage to private persons or property arising out of such work, and its liability for failure to use reasonable care therein, was not different from the duty and liability which would be imposed where the work was done directly by the city through its street work employees under direction and control of the board of public works.

We adopt as a correct statement of law the following text-book quotation found in appellant's brief: "So, where a city licenses a person to do an act dangerous in itself, or if it has, or ought to have, notice that its licensee has acted in a negligent manner and left its streets in an unsafe and a dangerous condition, it will be responsible therefor. But with these exceptions, it is not, ordinarily, liable for the acts of its licensees. While a municipal corporation is not liable in ordinary cases where it rightfully licenses third persons to use its streets, still, it can not, by a license, abdicate its powers or surrender its duty, and it remains bound to exercise a general supervisory duty. It is not, however, liable for the acts of its licensees unless it is negligent in respect to its own duty, and it is, therefore, usually necessary, in order to charge the municipality, to show much more than negligence on the part of its licensee." Elliott on Roads and Streets (4th Ed. 1926) vol. II, p. 1053, § 816. It is worthy of note that in the instant case the license or permission was not merely for some special use of the street as an incident to some private interest of the licensee, but was a permission granted to make changes in the street itself, and so became a part of the action of the city in relation to street construction work.

On the facts shown by the evidence in the case at bar it was the duty of the city through its department of public works, when it elected to permit the work in question to be done by Butterfield, to maintain over his work such supervision as would reasonably guard against any negligence which would leave the street in an unsafe and dangerous condition. The city was not authorized to abdicate its powers or surrender to a private person its duty to exercise proper supervision of the work which it permitted to be done.

[5] By statute it is provided that municipalities shall be liable for injuries to persons and property resulting from the dangerous or defective condition of public streets, in all cases where the governing or managing board or officer having authority to remedy such condition, had knowledge or notice of the defective or dangerous condition, and failed or neglected, for a reasonable time after acquiring such knowledge or receiving such notice, to remedy such condition, or to take such action as may be reasonably necessary to protect the public against such dangerous or defective condition. Stats. 1923, p. 675, Deering's Gen. Laws (1923 Ed.) Act 5619. The board of works knew that this work was to be done, as requested and permitted in accordance with the recommendation of the city engineer, and knew that said recommendation did not contain any provision for protection of property in the ravine against damage which reasonably might have been expected to result from the work as proposed to be done. Such knowledge, in view of the physical situation of the streets and adjacent property, was equivalent to notice of the dangerous condition which would be created by the proposed changes if permitted to be done without some provision for suitable drainage. To hold otherwise would be to presume that the board had the right to act without even attempting to exercise its intelligence in passing upon a subject of substantial importance.

Generally, on the subject of municipal liability for damages in actions of this character, we refer to the opinion of this court in Dick v. City of Los Angeles, 34 Cal. App. 724, 168 P. 703.

[6] Finally, it is contended by appellant that, because the control and improvement of public streets is "a municipal affair," and because there is no charter provision or ordinance of the city creating liability for such negligence as was shown in this case, therefore that there is no legal foundation for the judgment. There is, we may assume, no doubt that the matter of improving streets is a municipal affair, upon which the charter of the city, in so far as it speaks, is paramount to general laws. Civic Center Association v. Railroad Commission, 175 Cal. 441, 445, 166 P. 351. Whether the city could by charter thus exempt itself from liability for negligence, we are not now called upon to determine. But, even if the city by its charter could divest itself of subjection to the general law of liability for negligence in relation to street improvements, we are not aware of any provision in the charter, whereby the city of Los Angeles has attempted to exempt itself from the general law in relation to such liability.

The judgment is affirmed.

KNIGHT, J.

Appellant was indicted for the crime of grand theft, the specific charge being that he unlawfully took, stole, and carried away the personal property of Mrs. Blanche Thomas, consisting of 50 shares of the capital stock of the American International Corporation, of the value of $4,000. Upon trial before a jury he was found guilty, and this appeal was taken from the judgment of conviction and the order denying his motion for a new trial.

One of the grounds urged for reversal is that the evidence is legally insufficient to sustain the judgment. The essential facts are as follows: Mrs. Thomas wanted to invest some money in corporate stock, and being entirely inexperienced in such matters she subscribed for a weekly publication edited by appellant, which purported to furnish information as to the condition of the stock market. After taking the publication for a few months she called on appellant at the offices of the publication, as a result of which she was induced to invest $1,000 in the stock of a company known as the "Coast Foundation." Shortly afterwards she again conferred with him and was then advised to purchase Rainier Pulp & Paper Company stock, which she agreed to do; and for such purpose she mailed appellant a check for $2,000. She did not receive an acknowledgment of the receipt of the check, and after waiting nearly two weeks phoned appellant about the matter, and was informed, so she claims, that the delay was due merely to carelessness on his part, and that he would send her a statement at once. The next day Mrs. Thomas received a letter from him inclosing a statement of account issued by a brokerage firm showing that with her money appellant had opened an account with said firm in his own name and had purchased on margin the stock of a different company, namely, 50 shares of the capital stock of the American International Corporation; that the full purchase price thereof was $3,868.75, against which there was a credit payment of $2,000, and that the balance due was $1,868.75. The letter in which the statement was inclosed read as follows: "As a matter of convenience in making purchases and sales, I placed the $2,000 received from you on July 25 in an account at J. J. Barneson & Co., as per statement enclosed herewith. This letter will act as your receipt for the funds and evidence that the account is held by me in trust for you. Should this manner not meet with your approval, I will be pleased to assign and transfer the account to you at any time. * * *" Then, after describing the nature of the business of the American International Corporation and the promising future predicted for it, the letter continued: "If you are satisfied with the manner in which I have planned to handle your account, I will arrange with the broker so he will mail to you direct statement of the account at regular intervals, so you may be familiar with it at all times. Trusting that all I have done in this regard meets with your hearty approval, and assuring you that I will handle the account in the same manner as if it were my own funds instead of yours. * * *" In response thereto Mrs. Thomas mailed appellant a second check for $2,000, to cover the balance due on the stock. The letter accompanying the check was dated August 8, and read as follows: "So many appointments were made yesterday that I had to keep, by the time I arrived in that part of town the bank was closed. I hope the delay has not caused any confusion as to the plans you may have formed. Please find enclosed the check for two thousand dollars and believe me, gratefully yours. * * *" About this time she informed appellant that she intended to sail for Australia within a few days to be gone several months, and she requested him to suspend the sending of any further mail until she returned. Accordingly she left during the early part of September, and, as will hereinafter appear, did not return until the following December. Upon the receipt of the second check for $2,000 appellant applied the same as a final payment on the purchase price of the American International Corporation stock; but within a few days thereafter, through the account he had opened in his name with said firm, purchased on margin the stock of several other corporations, pledging as security for the payment thereof the American International Corporation stock belonging to Mrs. Thomas. In October there was a "break" in the stock market, and said brokerage firm sold the pledged stock in liquidation of the balance due on said account. In December Mrs. Thomas returned, and after several unsuccessful attempts to make an appointment with appellant for the purpose of obtaining possession of her stock he finally told her that while she was away her stock was lost in the crash of the market.

[1, 2] The main disputed issue of fact before the jury was whether Mrs. Thomas authorized appellant to speculate with her money or securities. In this regard Mrs. Thomas testified that at no time, nor under any circumstances, did she authorize him to purchase any stocks whatever on margin, nor to invest in any other stock than the Rainier Paper & Pulp Company stock; nor to pledge her stocks for any purpose whatsoever; and that whatever appellant did in that regard was done without her knowledge, consent, or authority. On the other hand, appellant testified that she turned the money over to him for "trading purposes," and that before doing so it was understood that he would purchase the stocks on margin; that he assumed, therefore, that he had authority to use her money and securities as he saw fit, and that, if he was mistaken in such assumption, there was no intent on his part to defraud, and that consequently he cannot be held criminally responsible for the loss. It will be readily seen, however, that appellant's testimony did no more than to raise a conflict as to the main issue in the case, and since the jury accepted and acted upon the testimony of Mrs. Thomas, which, along with the other facts established, is legally sufficient to sustain the conviction, its determination of the matter is controlling on appeal.

[3] Appellant further contends that, if he committed any offense at all, it consisted of the misappropriation of the money Mrs. Thomas gave him to purchase Rainier Pulp & Paper Company stock, and not the American International Corporation stock which he purchased therewith. The evidence shows, however, that Mrs. Thomas ratified the purchase of the American International Corporation stock by sending him the balance due on the purchase price thereof; and that subsequently, after the stock had been fully paid for, and without the consent, knowledge, or authority of Mrs. Thomas, so she claims and as the jury found, he pledged the same in carrying on his own private marginal stock speculations. Therefore he was properly charged with and legally convicted of the unlawful misappropriation of said stock. People v. Riccardi, 50 Cal. App. 427, 195 P. 448; People v. Plum, 88 Cal. App. 575, 263 P. 862, 265 P. 322. The cases cited by appellant in support of his theory do not touch the point. They were decided prior to the 1927 amendment, and dealt merely with the technical distinction between larceny, embezzlement, and obtaining money under false pretenses, all of which were merged in the crime of theft under the 1927 amendment. People v. Plum, supra.

[4] It is further contended that the prosecution failed to prove the value of the stock at the time of the alleged misappropriation thereof. There appears to be no direct testimony on this point, but the statement of account and the testimony given in connection therewith shows that on July 24th, the date the stock was purchased, it had a market value of $3,868.75; and it was further shown that in October, when the market "broke" and the pledgee sold the stock, it still had a market value of about $40 a share. Such evidence was ample, therefore, to justify the jury in finding that, at the time the stock was unlawfully pledged by appellant in August, its market value was in excess of $200; and that therefore the misappropriation thereof constituted grand theft.

[5, 6] At the time Mrs. Thomas sent appellant the first $2,000 to purchase the Rainier Paper & Pulp Company stock, she also forwarded to him an additional $250 on behalf of her nephew, with directions to purchase therewith certain oil stocks; and over the objection of appellant the prosecution was allowed to introduce evidence tending to show that appellant appropriated the money, temporarily, at least, to his own use. We find no error in admitting the testimony, because the rule is that, where the question of intent becomes a material issue in the case, evidence of other contemporaneous acts of a similar character are admissible to prove such intent (People v. Lorden, 62 Cal. App. 501, 217 P. 117; People v. Sindici, 54 Cal. App. 193, 201 P. 975); and appellant was here claiming that there was no fraudulent intent on his part in dealing with Mrs. Thomas' property as he did.

Appellant asserts that the court compelled him to argue his motion for a directed verdict in the presence of the jury, which he claims operated to his prejudice. An examination of the record discloses, however, that no arguments whatever, by either side, were made at the time the motion was presented, the court having restricted the proceeding to a mere statement by counsel for appellant of the grounds of the motion, immediately following which the motion was denied. In that state of the record no ground for complaint appears to exist.

[7, 8] Nor do we find any error in the refusal of the court to give appellant's instructions. The first was an instruction to return a verdict of not guilty, which, in view of the conflict of evidence, was properly rejected. And the legal principles embodied in the remaining two were given in another form in the court's charge. No error appearing in the record, the trial court was justified in denying the motion for a new trial.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; J. R. Welch, Judge.

Action by W. S. Murphy against the F. D. Cornell Company. From a portion of the judgment awarding attorney's fees to plaintiff, and from an order refusing to tax certain items of costs, defendant appeals.

Affirmed as modified.

Kirkbride, Wilson & Brooks, of San Mateo, for appellant.

Alfred Aram, of San Jose, for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

An appeal by the defendant from a portion of the judgment in the above case awarding attorney's fees, and from an order refusing to tax certain items of plaintiff's costs in the action.

The complaint set forth separate causes of action on two promissory notes and also common counts for work and labor. The first note was for $4,947.50, with interest, which was executed by defendant corporation to the plaintiff. The second note, which was for $2,500 with interest, was executed by O. L. Bergen and Persis Bergen to the defendant, and by the latter indorsed to plaintiff as security for the first note. The court entered judgment against defendant on the first note for the principal and interest due; on the second no recovery was allowed except for attorney's fees in the sum of $500; and on the common counts judgment was entered for the defendant.

Plaintiff filed a cost bill, from which it appears that he attached real and personal property of the defendant in several counties. The items of which defendant complains, and which among others he moved to tax, were a sum alleged to have been expended in the levy of the attachment upon a number of parcels of land in Riverside county, namely $261.10, and the expense of "obtaining a description of property for attachment" in the sum of $36.70.

[1] The note upon which the attorney's fee was allowed contained the following provision: " * * * And in case suit is brought hereon or attorney be employed or expenses incurred to compel the payment hereof, a reasonable sum in addition as attorney's fee." It is clear from this provision that an attorney's fee might be allowed in a proper case where suit was brought to compel payment and an attorney employed; but such fees are in the nature of special damage under the contract (Prescott v. Grady, 91 Cal. 518, 27 P. 755; De Jarnatt v. Marquez, 127 Cal. 558, 60 P. 45, 78 Am. St. Rep. 90); and it has been held that an allowance of attorney's fees to the losing party—which was the case here—is improper. (McArthur v. John McArthur Co., 39 Cal. App. 704, 179 P. 700; Hering v. Simon, 77 Neb. 60, 108 N. W. 154.)

In support of the motion to tax costs, affidavits were filed by the president of defendant corporation and its counsel. These affidavits were not denied. According to the same, plaintiff attached eighty parcels of real property belonging to the corporation in Riverside county aggregating several thousand acres, the value of defendant's interest therein being approximately $100,000. The affidavits alleged that the amount and value of the property attached was disproportionate to the amount sued for, and that the same was attached pursuant to a threat by plaintiff's counsel to destroy the corporation if the claims were not paid. It also appears therefrom that the greater portion of the land attached is subject to a deed of trust and mortgages, and that several hundred acres had been sold and full payment made therefor by the purchaser.

[2-4] While it has been held that, where the items claimed as costs do not appear on their face to be necessary, and their correctness is challenged by the affidavit of the contesting party, the burden is then upon the claimant to prove that the charges are proper, and, if he fails to introduce evidence to that effect, they should be stricken out (Miller v. Highland Ditch Co., 91 Cal. 103, 27 P. 536; Senior v. Anderson, 130 Cal. 290, 62 P. 563; Whitaker v. Moran, 23 Cal. App. 758, 139 P. 901), nevertheless, where the items appear to be proper charges, a verified memorandum of costs is prima facie evidence that the same had been necessarily incurred (Fay v. Fay, 165 Cal. 469, 132 P. 1040; Ray v. Clark, 57 Cal. App. 467, 207 P. 501). Here the cost of levying the attachment was prima facie a proper charge; and, considering the incumbered condition of defendant's land as shown by the affidavits, it does not necessarily appear that the expenditure was made in bad faith or for the purpose of obstruction. The question was primarily one for the trial court, the determination of the items allowable for costs being left largely to its discretion; and, unless an abuse of discretion is shown, such determination will not be disturbed on appeal. Welch v. Alcott, 178 Cal. 530, 174 P. 34; Puppo v. Larosa, 194 Cal. 721, 230 P. 440. In view of the facts, we cannot say that the allowance of this amount by the court was an abuse of discretion.

[5, 6] As regards the item of $36.70, there is nothing in the record as to how the description of the property was obtained, and the necessity for this expenditure was controverted by the affidavits mentioned. For aught that appears, the information may have been obtained by plaintiff or his counsel from the public records, in which case the charge would be clearly improper. As in the analogous case of a claim by a successful plaintiff for the cost of obtaining a replevin bond from a surety company, such a charge was not necessarily incurred within the meaning of section 1033 of the Code of Civil Procedure (Williams v. Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Ry. Co., 156 Cal. 140, 103 P. 885, 134 Am. St. Rep. 117, 19 Ann. Cas. 1260); and, in the absence of evidence showing its necessity, the same should have been stricken from the cost bill (Miller v. Highland Ditch Co., supra; Whitaker v. Moran, supra). It is generally held that expenditures incurred by the prevailing party for his own benefit in the preparation of his case are not taxable in the action, among such expenditures being the preparation of a map (Miller v. Highland Ditch Co., supra), the expenses of an expert accountant (Faulkner v. Hendy, 79 Cal. 265, 21 P. 754), and the fees of a surveyor for obtaining data for the preparation of maps (Bathgate v. Irvine, 126 Cal. 135, 58 P. 442, 77 Am. St. Rep. 158).

The judgment is accordingly modified by deducting therefrom the allowance made for attorney's fees, namely, $500. The order appealed from is also modified by striking therefrom the item of $36.70 claimed as the expense of obtaining a description of property for attachment, and as so modified is affirmed. It is further ordered that appellant recover its costs on appeal.

OGBURN v. ATCHISON, T. & S. F. RY. CO.
et al.
Civ. 513.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District,
California.

Dec. 20, 1930.

Rehearing Denied Jan. 14, 1931. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 16, 1931.

1. Railroads — 350(23).

Where motorist on city street observed wigwag and crossing bell at crossing with obstructed view were not operating, and she stopped, looked and listened, though not alighting, question of contributory negligence held for jury.

Evidence favorable to motorist disclosed that motorist had seen wigwag at crossing for years and knew device operated when train was coming; that when she stopped wigwag did not move and bell did not ring; that she listened but heard no train or warning signal; that she looked both ways, view being obstructed by trees which prevented motorist from seeing more than ten or twelve feet of tracks from where she stopped; that she started car forward in low gear and was proceeding at low speed when struck, and that she did not see train until within three or four feet of track, and became frightened at seeing train so close at hand. Train was "drifting" without use of steam, which may have lessened its noise.

2. Railroads — 350(22).

Whether motorist was contributorily negligent in failing to stop motor of automobile without muffler to hear train held for jury.

Motorist testified both windows of car were open; that car did not seem to make much noise; that she was listening for noise of train; and that car did not bother her. It could not be said, as matter of law, that this fact prevented motorist from hearing train, especially in view of other evidence that train was drifting and no bell or whistle was sounded.

3. Railroads ☞ 350(28).

Evidence held not to show, as matter of law, that motorist placed no reliance upon warning device at crossing; hence did not take case out of "guarded crossing rule."

On cross-examination, motorist was being interrogated upon her custom in stopping and crossing during preceding five years, testified that she stopped whether wigwag was operating or not, and in answer to question, "You don't rely on wigwag but would rather trust your own senses in that connection?" answered in affirmative. In other portions of testimony, it appeared affirmatively that on occasion in question motorist did rely upon warning device in part, although she stopped, looked, and listened, notwithstanding device was not operating.

Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; H. G. Ames, Judge.

Action by Ruth Ogburn against the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Railway Company and another. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff appeals.

Reversed.

E. B. Drake, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Robert Brennan, M. W. Reed, E. T. Lucey, Leo E. Sievert, and H. K. Lockwood, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

BARNARD, J.

This is an action for damages for personal injuries received by the plaintiff in a collision between an automobile driven by her, and a railroad train operated by defendants. A nonsuit was granted by the trial court on the sole ground of the contributory negligence of the plaintiff, and the only question here presented is whether such negligence may be imputed to her as a matter of law, under the facts shown.

Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to appellant, the following facts appear: The accident occurred at a point where the single track of the respondent railroad crosses Seventeenth street in the city of Santa Ana, which point is within a mile of the railroad company's depot in said city. The appellant was driving westerly in a Ford coupé on Seventeenth street, a paved and busy street, about 3 o'clock in the afternoon. Her car was struck by a train operated by the respondents, consisting of a steam engine and five cars, which was entering Santa Ana from the north, at a speed of about forty miles per hour, and, as testified by the engineer, the engine was not "working steam" but was "drifting." There was evidence that no bell was rung, and that no whistle was blown until the train arrived at a distance from the crossing, which one witness estimated as one and one-half times the length of the courtroom (see section 486 of the Civil Code). The respondent company had installed at this crossing a warning signal commonly known as a wigwag, which, when properly working, gave warning of approaching trains by oscillating a disk back and forth and ringing a bell. The appellant, a young lady about thirty years of age, testified that her hearing and sight were good; that she had crossed this crossing frequently for five or six years; that as she approached the crossing on this occasion, she stopped for three or four seconds when about ten or twelve feet from the first rail; that she looked both ways and listened and looked at the bell (the wigwag) and did not see or hear anything; that no whistle was blown or bell rung on the train; and that she was unable to see up the track to her right because of certain trees. It appears that beginning about ten or twelve feet to the right of the point where she stopped, and extending northerly along the railroad track, was a walnut grove of large trees, heavy with fruit, the branches of which came within three or four feet of the ground and extended to within five or six feet of the first rail of the railroad track. The appellant testified that she had seen the wigwag at this crossing for about five years and that she knew how the device operated when a train was coming; that when she stopped, she looked at the wigwag and it did not move, nor did the bell ring; that she next looked both ways and then started her car forward in low gear and was proceeding at a speed of three or four miles an hour when she was hit; that as she proceeded, she first looked down the track to the south, and, seeing nothing, turned and looked to the north; that when she was within three or four feet of the track and saw the train it seemed right there; and that she was scared and turned her wheel and just then the train struck her car, causing the injuries complained of. On cross-examination, appellant testified that she first looked at the wigwag when about fifty feet from the track and continued to watch it as she approached; that she saw it was not going, and came to a stop; that she then looked at the wigwag, which was not moving; that she then looked to the north and south; that she could not see through the leaves of the walnut trees; that on previous trips across this crossing she always came to a complete stop whether the wigwag was going or not; that as she started forward in low gear, she was listening for trains to blow their whistles or other noise; that the first intimation she had of the approach of the train was when the front wheels of her automobile were on the first rail of the track, at which time the train was fifty or sixty feet away; that she heard no sound from the approaching train; and that after starting up in low gear, she looked first to the south and then to the north, at which time the front wheels of her car were three or four feet from the first rail. She further testified that the windows of her automobile were open, and that, because the trees were so thick on this occasion, she stopped and "looked good."

Respondents argue that appellant was guilty of contributory negligence in not stopping the engine of her automobile while she was attempting to listen for sounds of an approaching train, and also in stopping at a place where, on account of the trees, she could not see more than ten or twelve feet up the track. They rely upon the general rule that the driver of an automobile before crossing a railroad track, which is in itself a warning, must stop, look, and listen, even to the extent, if necessary, of getting out and walking ahead to a point where he can assure himself that no train is approaching. Young v. Pac. Elec. R. Co., 208 Cal. 568, 283 P. 61; Herbert v. Southern Pacific Co., 121 Cal. 227, 53 P. 651; Koster v. Southern Pacific Co., 207 Cal. 753, 279 P. 788; Jones v. Southern Pacific Co., 34 Cal. App. 629, 168 P. 586; Chrissinger v. Southern Pacific Co., 169 Cal. 619, 149 P. 175; Griffin v. San Pedro, etc., Co., 170 Cal. 772, 151 P. 282, L. R. A. 1916A, 842. The rule has been established, by such cases as these, that, where "the standard of conduct is so obvious as to be applicable to all persons and the plaintiff has failed to measure up to that standard, under the circumstances shown, he is not entitled to have his case go to the jury." In Koster v. Southern Pacific Co., 207 Cal. 753, 279 P. 788, 792, the court after reviewing a number of cases said: "In all cases in which judgments have been upheld, either the injured party stopped, looked, and listened, or took every opportunity to learn of the approach of the train that a cautious person should have taken in the circumstances of the situation." In that case, the court calls attention to the fact that, under the circumstances there existing, a traveler had an open space of approximately twenty-one feet six inches in which to make observation for an approaching train. Although the appellant, in the instant case, did stop, look, and listen, and thereafter proceeded slowly, in low gear, and with considerable caution, and although her opportunity for observation up the track in the direction from which this train came was very limited on account of the proximity of the trees to the rails, it may be conceded that she failed to meet the utmost requirement of the general rule above stated, in that she did not alight and walk ahead.

We think, however, that under the circumstances this case falls within what may be called a partial modification of the strict stop, look, and listen rule above referred to, and that it comes rather within the rules laid down in the guarded crossing cases. In the case of Koch v. Southern Cal. Ry. Co., 148 Cal. 677, 84 P. 176, 177, 4 L. R. A. (N. S.) 521, 113 Am. St. Rep. 332, 7 Ann. Cas. 795, a case involving a crossing where the railroad company maintained gates and signal bells, although it was held that the plaintiff had failed to exercise any care whatever for his own safety, the court said: "The case thus presented is not one as to the degree or amount of care which should be exercised by one about to cross a railroad under the invitation to proceed given by the open gates, but whether under such circumstances a man may fail or decline to exercise any care whatsoever, treating the open gates as a positive assurance of safety. Of course, in any case such as this, where it is shown that a plaintiff has exercised some care, the question whether or not the care actually exercised was due and sufficient, will always be a matter for determination by the jury. But where, as here, the unconflicting evidence shows that he exercised no care whatsoever, it becomes a question of law to say whether or not such a plaintiff's case shall be submitted to the jury. * * * Nor is it the law that when a railroad company adopts safety gates or any other appliance for the protection of the public, the public is thereby absolved from all duty of taking care of itself. A person is still required to exercise due and ordinary care, and while the quantum of care which will be reasonable may be less where the gates are provided and are relied upon by the traveler, still the gates, themselves, are not an assurance and a warranty such as to justify a traveler in going blindly ahead in total disregard of all ordinary precautions, as did the plaintiff in this instance. * * *"

In Gregg v. Western Pacific Railroad Co., 193 Cal. 212, 223 P. 553, 557, a case in which a flagman who was kept at a crossing to warn the public of approaching trains was absent from his post, it was held that the case fell within the rules controlling guarded crossings, and a judgment of nonsuit was reversed. There the injured party testified that he had checked his speed to five or six miles an hour, had listened and also looked, so far as the conditions appeared to him to require it, for trains that might be approaching. His view was somewhat obstructed, and a street car had just crossed the railroad, its conductor having previously walked forward to make observation for approaching trains. The plaintiff had assumed from the absence of the watchman that it was safe to cross the track. The court said: "It is true, as has often been stated, that a railroad crossing is itself a place of danger and is an effectual warning of danger, which must always be heeded, and the exercise of ordinary care in traveling over such place is not excused by the negligent omission of the railroad company itself to exercise reasonable care. But it is also true that a railway company will not be permitted to encourage the public to relax its vigil as to the dangers that lurk in railroad crossings by assurances that the danger has been removed or minimized by the adoption of safety devices and measures and at the same time hold a person to the same quantum of care as if no such safety measures had been provided." And further: "If a reasonably prudent person situated as appellant was situated, and seeing what he then saw and knew, would have been justified in acting upon appearances as appellant assumed to do, or, if reasonably prudent men would disagree as to whether appellant exercised ordinary care in the premises, then the case should have gone to the jury. The invitation to cross, the failure to ring the bell or sound the whistle, as required by the provisions of section 486, Civil Code, are elements which must be considered with all the other facts and circumstances of the entire case."

In Marini v. Southern Pacific Co., 201 Cal. 392, 257 P. 74, 75, the railroad company had maintained gates and signal bells at a crossing for many years. The appellant often used the crossing and learned to depend upon the signals and gates. At the time of the accident, the towerman was telephoning and failed to lower the gate or sound the bells as the train was approaching. The appellant claimed that his view of the approaching train was obstructed, and before crossing the tracks he stopped his automobile to shift into intermediate gear and did not proceed until he had looked and listened. The court, in reversing a judgment of nonsuit, and holding that under the circumstances the question of contributory negligence on the part of appellant was one for the jury, said: "In the instant case the fact that appellant did not drive blindly and heedlessly into danger, without any care whatsoever for his safety, is made plain by his uncontradicted testimony that he stopped to shift into intermediate gear and was proceeding cautiously over the tracks when the accident occurred. In such case, as above stated, the question of whether or not the care actually exercised was due and sufficient will always be a matter for determination by the jury."

In Vaca v. Southern Pacific Co., 91 Cal. App. 470, 267 P. 346, 349, which was a case where a crossing bell erected by a railroad company to warn persons of the approach of trains did not ring on the occasion in question, the court, in discussing the question of contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff, used the following language:

"While a traveler about to cross a railroad track is generally charged with the duty of stopping and looking before crossing the tracks, in each particular case his discharge of that duty and his care or negligence is to be measured in the light of surrounding conditions and circumstances. It is true that he may not seek redress for an injury caused solely through his own carelessness, but in measuring his conduct a jury may take into consideration that the railroad company has created a condition which has caused the traveler to relax his own vigilance so that he is brought to his destruction or injury. Scott v. San Bernardino Valley Co., 152 Cal. 610, 93 P. 677; Runnels v. United Railroads, 175 Cal. 528, 166 P. 18. It is only when the evidence is such that the court is impelled to say that it is not in conflict on the facts and that from these facts reasonable men can draw but one inference, and that an inference pointing unerringly to the negligence of the plaintiff contributing to his own injury, that the law steps in and forbids the plaintiff a recovery. Zibbell v. Southern Pacific Co., 160 Cal. 237, 240, 116 P. 513.

"In Smith v. Southern Pacific Co., 201 Cal. 57, 255 P. 500, the court uses this language: "The rights and obligations of all persons using a public street are, in this respect, reciprocal. Each may rightfully expect that the other will, at the proper time, discharge his proper duty towards others. He cannot rely wholly on the care of others, nor, on that account, neglect to use the precautions which the particular situation demands of him. But he frequently must, to some extent, depend on others in such situations, and his conduct must be considered in view of that fact in determining whether or not it is negligent. His care, or want of care, in such cases is generally a matter to be determined by the jury from all the circumstances surrounding him at the time." See, also, Marini v. Southern Pacific Co., 201 Cal. 392, 257 P. 74, and Clark v. Bennett, 123 Cal. 275, 277, 55 P. 908, and we think in the present case the question of the contributory negligence of plaintiff under the circumstances disclosed was a question for the jury."

As was further said in Gregg v. Western Pacific R. Co., supra: "The extent to which a traveler may rely upon the assurance of safety arising from the absence of a flagman from his post of duty on the presumption that it is safe for him to cross a railroad track which he is familiar with, is generally held to be a question of fact for the jury."

[1] Under the circumstances of this case, a lesser degree of care was reasonably to be expected from the appellant than would have been the case had the wigwag signal not been installed and used at that particular crossing. While the presence of this automatic device did not relieve her from exercising such care for her own protection as was reasonable under the circumstances, the precise measure of the care still legally required of her has not been established by law, but depended upon the circumstances there existing. Appellant took certain precautions for her own safety. Although she observed that the wigwag was not working, she stopped, looked, and listened. She not only looked several times at the wigwag, but she looked up and down the track, and continued to look and listen as she proceeded in low gear, at a speed of about three or four miles per hour. The circumstances were somewhat unusual in the limited space, before reaching the track, that permitted a clear view in the direction from which the train was coming. Taking the view of the evidence most favorable to the appellant, she saw the train when her car was three or four feet from the track, and her inability to stop then may have been due to her fright at seeing the train so close at hand. This is not only the more probable, but may have been the more excusable, since no bell was rung, no whistle was blown until the train was right upon her, and the train was "drifting" without the use of steam, which may have lessened its noise. We think there is here presented a question of fact, as to whether such precautions as were taken by appellant were reasonable under the circumstances, which should have been submitted to the jury.

[2] Respondents argue that appellant was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law, in not stopping the motor in her car while listening for sounds of an approaching train, since she testified that she did not have a muffler on her car. We are asked to take judicial notice of the fact that an automobile without a muffler, particularly a Ford, creates an excessive amount of noise. Appellant testified that both windows of her car were open; that the car did not seem to make much noise; that she was listening for the noise of the train; and that the Ford did not bother her. The noise made by such a motor would vary, depending upon its condition and the speed at which it was running. It cannot be said as a matter of law that this fact prevented appellant from hearing the train, especially in view of the other evidence that the train was drifting, and no bell or whistle was sounded. This is but a part of a question of fact which was for the jury.

[3] Respondents also earnestly insist that this case comes within the more strict general rule above referred to, and not the guarded crossing rule, it being argued that appellant testified that she did not rely upon the wigwag at this particular crossing, but always stopped, irrespective of whether or not the wigwag was operating, and, therefore, that the effect would be the same as if the signal was not there. In support of this, respondents rely upon the following testimony given by appellant:

"Q. Your testimony now is that in all the five years previous that you have crossed that crossing that you always come to a complete stop? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Whether the wigwag was going or not? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. But on the previous occasions you hadn't hesitated as long as on this occasion? A. Some of them possibly not that long and others longer. The trees were so thick this time I stopped and looked good.

"Q. Were the trees any thicker than they were the week before when you had gone through there? A. No, possibly not.

"Q. Did you stop any longer the week before? A. Not any longer.

"Q. Had you ever come to that crossing when the wigwag was working? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. But when the wigwag wasn't operating you stopped just the same? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And you don't rely on the wigwag to warn you of the approaching train, but you would rather trust your senses in that connection? A. Yes, sir."

The last question comes very near to being a catch question. If appellant had relied on the wigwag, under the decisions above quoted, she would have been guilty of contributory negligence. It will be noted that in this testimony, which occurred on cross-examination, she was being interrogated upon her custom over the preceding five years. The last question and answer, particularly relied upon by respondents in this connection, referred to this custom, and the witness did not say that she did not rely at all upon the wigwag on this particular occasion. Not only is it a fair construction of her testimony that it was not her custom to rely entirely upon the wigwag, a thing she should not have done, but in other portions of her testimony it affirmatively appears that on this occasion she did rely upon it in part. She testified that she looked at the wigwag before she stopped and continued to watch it as she approached the tracks, and that when she stopped she looked first at the wigwag and observed it was not moving. With the inferences that may legitimately be drawn from her testimony, we think it may not be held, as a matter of law, that she placed no reliance at all upon the warning device, and that it may not be conclusively presumed that the effect was the same as if the signal had never been there.

We are of the opinion that the facts of this case present a question which should have been submitted to the jury. The judgment appealed from is reversed.

We concur: MARKS, Acting P. J.; WAR-MER, Justice pro tem.

PEOPLE v. DUFFY et al.
Cr. 1141.

District Court of Appeal, Third District,
California.

Dec. 24, 1930.

Rehearing Denied Jan. 8, 1931. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 22, 1931.

1. Criminal law ⇨576(4).

That defendants changed pleas of not guilty to guilty and of guilty back to not guilty, under circumstances, constituted good cause for delay in not bringing defendants to trial within 60 days (Pen. Code, § 1382).

The circumstances disclosed that the information was filed on June 12, 1930, and that defendants were given opportunity of being tried on June 30, but that by changing their pleas from not guilty to guilty, and then on July 11 changing their pleas from guilty to not guilty, they themselves caused long delay in bringing case to trial by preventing district attorney from holding prosecuting witness.

2. Criminal law ⇨693.

Objection to foundation for introduction of transcript of testimony taken at preliminary examination made before attempt to lay foundation held premature.

3. Witnesses ⇨227.

Contention that district attorney's testimony could not be considered because he was not sworn as witness held unavailing, where no objection was taken before verdict.

4. Criminal law ⇨1144(12).

In absence of objections to admissibility of transcript of testimony given on preliminary examination, witness was presumed to have been duly sworn.

5. Criminal law ⇨1036(1).

Objection that transcript of evidence taken at preliminary examination was not properly authenticated held waived, where not made at trial.

6. Criminal law ⇨564(1).

Testimony that defendant stopped prosecuting witness in Sacramento county and forced him to drive across bridge into Yolo county, where robbery was committed, held sufficient to show commission of crime in Sacramento county.

The testimony was sufficient to show commission of crime in county of Sacramento, since it was the natural inference therefrom that the defendant stopped the prosecuting witness with the intent of robbing him and taking his automobile.

7. Criminal law ⇨406(4).

Testimony of defendant given at preliminary examination held admissible as admission.

8. Robbery ⇨24(1).

Evidence held to support conviction of robbery in second degree.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; John F. Pullen, Judge.

Leonard Duffy and another were convicted of robbery in the second degree, and they appeal.

Affirmed.

Gilford G. Rowland, of Sacramento, and Robert P. Cahen, of San Francisco, for appellants.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the people.

Mr. Presiding Justice FINCH delivered the opinion of the court.

This is an appeal by the defendants from judgments of conviction of the crime of robbery of the second degree. The appellants contend that they were not brought to a speedy trial within the meaning of section 1382 of the Penal Code.

The information was filed June 12, 1930. On June 20, both defendants entered pleas of not guilty and the cause was set down to be tried June 30. On that day both defendants changed their pleas from not guilty to guilty and asked the court to admit them to probation. The court referred their applications to the probation officer, with direction to make an investigation and to report thereon on July 11. On the latter day the probation officer made an adverse report, and the defendants were permitted to change their pleas from guilty to not guilty, and the cause was continued to July 14 to be then set for trial. On July 14, by consent of the defendants, their trial was set for July 17. On the latter date, with the consent of the defendants, the cause was continued to August 1 to be then reset for trial. On August 1, by consent of both parties, the trial was set for August 7, and on that date, by consent of the parties, a continuance was granted to August 11, at which time the cause was to be reset for trial. On August 11 defendants' counsel made a motion for a dismissal of the cause, and, on the denial of the motion, the defendants waived a jury trial. Thereupon, at the same session the court suggested August 15 as the day for trial. Counsel for defendants said: "The quicker it would be tried the better." The court then said: "Well, I think we can set it for the 14th." Counsel for the defendants replied: "That will be satisfactory." On August 14 counsel for defendants moved for a dismissal on the ground that the defendants had not been brought to trial within sixty days after the filing of the information. On July 17 the district attorney asked for a continuance on the ground of his inability to find the prosecuting witness, saying he would have had such witness present if he had known that the pleas were to be changed from guilty to not guilty, and further stating that: "The complaining witness stayed in town three weeks for the purpose of attending this trial. After the plea of guilty on the part of these defendants, he had reason to believe the case was over and therefore he left town." Counsel for the defendants said: "The fault is not with the district attorney, * * * and under the circumstances, I would not oppose a continuance and giving the district attorney's office a reasonable opportunity to find their witness."

When the cause was called on August 7 the district attorney stated that he had been unable to locate the complaining witness; that "we held the complaining witness here for a period of * * * nearly three weeks. He was a man who at the time worked for the Piggly-Wiggly stores * * * he was fired from the Piggly-Wiggly stores and left * * * without giving any notice or any forwarding address. * * * I told him myself he didn't need to wait around here because there had been a plea of guilty; we told him we were through with him"; that the district attorney began trying to locate the witness on July 11, the day on which the defendants changed their pleas from guilty to not guilty, and that the witness had been gone about a week at that time.

Section 1382 of the Penal Code provides: "The court, unless good cause to the contrary is shown, must order the prosecution to be dismissed in the following cases: * * * 2. If a defendant, whose trial has not been postponed upon his application, is not brought to trial within sixty days after the finding of the indictment, or filing of the information."

[1] In this case it appears that good cause was shown for continuing the case beyond the period of sixty days. The defendants were given the opportunity of being tried on June 30, but by changing their pleas from not guilty to guilty, and then on July 11 changing their pleas from guilty to not guilty, they, themselves, caused a long delay in bringing the case to trial and prevented the district attorney from holding the prosecuting witness. It is a sufficient answer to a motion to dismiss a criminal case on the ground of not being brought to trial within sixty days to show that there was good cause for the delay. People v. Clayton, 89 Cal. App. 405, 264 P. 1105; People v. Grace, 88 Cal. App. 222, 263 P. 306; People v. Brock, 87 Cal. App. 601, 262 P. 369, 263 P. 544; Murphy v. Superior Court, 53 Cal. App. 6, 200 P. 483.

294 P.—32

[2] The prosecuting witness is a man named Rogers. His testimony given at the preliminary examination was read in evidence at the trial, as was also that of another witness named Quinn. Appellants contend that the admission of such testimony is erroneous for the reason that there was an insufficient showing of diligence in finding Rogers, that there was no showing whatever for the admission of the transcript of Quinn's testimony, and that the transcript was not properly authenticated. At the beginning of the trial the district attorney said: "The court is well aware of the fact that we have not been able to produce Rogers here, he having left this vicinity, and for that reason the People are going to offer the transcript of the record of the preliminary hearing, and for that reason I wish to be sworn and—Mr. Green. To which production we desire to object on the grounds that the district attorney has not laid a sufficient foundation to enable them to introduce the record of the preliminary examination, and on the further ground it is incompetent, irrelevant and immaterial. The Court: Well, he was about to make a further showing at this time."

This objection having been made before any attempt to lay a foundation for the introduction in evidence of the transcript was premature and cannot be given any effect. The district attorney thereupon testified to facts showing due diligence in his effort to find Rogers, and he was cross-examined at length by counsel for the defendants.

[3] The record does not show that the district attorney was sworn as a witness and the appellants contend for that reason that no consideration can be given his testimony. In a note to State v. Morrow, 63 Wash. 297, 115 P. 161, Ann. Cas. 1912D, pages 570, 572, it is said: "It is generally held that where a witness testifies without having been sworn, the verdict will be set aside if the error is not discovered until after the verdict. * * * Where, however, a witness is permitted to testify without having been previously sworn, and that fact is known at the time, the defect must be taken advantage of at once, and a failure to do so is such acquiescence in the testimony as will preclude objection after verdict." In addition to the cases cited in support of this statement, the following are in point: Rhodes v. State, 122 Ga. 568, 50 S. E. 361; State v. Melancon, 163 La. 435, 112 So. 37; Karakutza v. State, 163 Wis. 293, 156 N. W. 965; Moore v. State, 96 Tenn. 209, 33 S. W. 1046; Barnes v. State, 61 Tex. Cr. R. 37, 133 S. W. 887.

[4] The transcript does not show that Rogers was sworn, and appellants contend that therefore it was error to admit the transcript of his testimony. In the absence of any objection made on this ground at the trial, it will be presumed that such witnesses were duly sworn. People v. Fisher, 223 N. Y. 459,

119 N. E. 845. The only objection which appellants made to the introduction of the transcript at the preliminary examination is as follows: "We don't object to the introduction of the part of the transcript relating to the testimony of the * * * complaining witness himself, but so far as the testimony of any one of the defendants that might appear there we object to that on the grounds that the district attorney is endeavoring to make these witnesses—the defendants a witness against themselves."

[5] It appears from the record therefore that the testimony given by Rogers and Quinn at the preliminary examination was admitted in evidence without objection. The appellants, having failed to object at the trial to the transcript of the evidence taken at the preliminary examination on the ground that it was not properly authenticated, must be held to have waived such objection, because, if the objection had been made at that time, the district attorney could doubtless have supplied the necessary proof.

It must be conceded that the case of the people was not carefully presented, but it does not appear that the irregularities of which appellants complain constitute prejudicial error.

[6] It is urged for a reversal that there was no evidence that the crime was committed in Sacramento county. The prosecuting witness testified that while riding in his automobile he met the defendants about at Fourth and L streets, in the city of Sacramento; that the defendant Thompson "got in front of the car at the crossing and I slowed down * * * one fellow got into the back seat and he got in front, I drove them across the bridge (the bridge across the Sacramento river, which is the dividing line between Sacramento and Yolo counties) * * * they just said to drive across, you see; when they told me to stop the car * * * Thompson, he says, 'You know what this means' and they took me out of the car and he hit me a knock at first and then went through my pockets and took my coat off * * * the other man came out second and he says, 'Let's give him the works' and the other fellow says 'No, he hasn't got much money, we got his car so let's beat it' * * * I had about $2.50, that is all." The defendants drove the automobile of the prosecuting witness to the town of Vallejo, where they were arrested. The foregoing testimony is amply sufficient to show the commission of the crime in the county of Sacramento, it being a natural inference from the testimony of the prosecuting witness that the defendants stopped such witness at Fourth and L streets with the intent of robbing him and taking his automobile.

[7] Appellants seem to contend that it was error to admit in evidence their testimony given at the preliminary examination. It is deemed sufficient to say that such evidence, like any other admissions made by the defendants, was admissible in evidence against them.

[8] Enough has been said to show that there is no merit in the appellants' contention "that the judgment is contrary to the evidence and the evidence is not sufficient to justify the judgment."

The judgments against both defendants are affirmed.

WHEATLAND v. MALONEY et al.
Civ. 178.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District,
California.

Dec. 6, 1930.

Rehearing Denied Dec. 20, 1930. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 2, 1931.

1. Process ⇨4.

When complaint is filed, service of "summons" is not necessary prerequisite to defendant's right to employ attorney and to appear and defend action.

The "summons" duly served is simply a mandate requiring appearance of defendant under penalty of having judgment entered for failure to do so.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Summons," see Words and Phrases.]

2. Attorney and client ⇨63.

Generally, securing attorney's services is matter of private contract.

3. Libel and slander ⇨129.

To recover statutory attorney's fee, defendants in libel and slander actions need not move for dismissal based on plaintiff's failure to file statutory bond (St. 1871-72, pp. 533, 534, §§ 1, 7).

St. 1871-72, p. 533, § 1, refers to necessity of bond by plaintiff in libel action, and section 7 allows defendant $100 for counsel fees in case action is dismissed or defendant recovers judgment.

4. Libel and slander ⇨129.

Dismissals, referred to in statute allowing defendant in libel action $100 for counsel fees if action is dismissed, are dismissals generally as provided by statute (St. 1871-72, p.
534, § 7; Code Civ. Proc. § 581).

5. Libel and slander ⇨129.

To recover statutory attorney's fee where libel action is dismissed, defendant need not file general appearance, provided he has employed attorney (St. 1871-72, pp. 533, 534, §§ 1, 7).

6. Libel and slander ⇨129.

Filing of complaint in libel action sets in motion provisions of statute allowing defendant $100 counsel fees in case of dismissal (St.
1871-72, pp. 533, 534, §§ 1, 7).

7. Libel and slander ⇨129.

Defendant in libel action, in case of dismissal, is entitled under statute to $100 counsel fee if he has employed attorney to defend action and has paid or agreed to pay him at least $100 (St. 1871-72, pp. 533, 534, § 1, 7).

8. Appeal and error ⇨907(3).

In absence of reporter's transcript or bill of exceptions, appellate court must assume evidence established facts necessary to judgment.

9. Appeal and error ⇨931(1).

All intendments are in favor of judgment.

10. Libel and slander ⇨129.

Defendants in libel action which plaintiff dismissed held entitled, under statute, to $100 attorney's fee, notwithstanding plaintiff subsequently filed new complaint substantially identical with that previously dismissed (St.
1871-72, pp. 533, 534, §§ 1, 7).

Recovery of attorney's fee was authorized, since attorneys employed by defendants to defend first action would be without authority to represent them in subsequent action, even though based on same cause of action and identical in form, until they were again authorized to represent defendants, and filing of new complaint instituted another action, although it was identical with dismissed action.

Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; G. K. Scovel, Judge.

Action by E. M. Wheatland against M. C.
Maloney and others, doing business under the fictitious name of the C. Company. The action as originally begun was dismissed by plaintiff, and a new action instituted. From a judgment awarding defendants attorney's fees in the action previously dismissed, plaintiff appeals.

WARMER, Justice pro tem.

The admitted facts, so far as pertinent here, are as follows: On February 11, 1930, plaintiff filed his complaint alleging libel against the defendants, M. C. Maloney et al. The complaint sets out the alleged libelous matter, alleges its falsity, and prays for judgment for damages. The clerk, without requiring the bond provided for in the Act of March 23, 1872 (St. 1871-72, p. 533), filed the complaint and issued summons, but no summons or notice of any kind was ever served on the defendants or any of them. On February 17, 1930, a dismissal of the action was entered by the clerk on the written order of plain-tiff's attorney, at which time no appearance of any kind had been made. Plaintiff, at the time of the dismissal above referred to, immediately filed another complaint identical with the complaint in the action that had just been dismissed, at which time plaintiff gave the statutory bond, and thereupon caused summons to be issued and served. Said action is now pending. On February 20, 1930, the defendants filed a notice of motion that they would move the court to enter judgment against the plaintiff in the sum of $100 for attorney's fees in said action theretofore dismissed. The principal point presented is, where a complaint in a libel action has been filed by the clerk and summons issued in the case without requiring the statutory bond and same has been dismissed by the clerk on order of plaintiff's attorneys before service of summons or appearance of the defendants or any of them, does the statute authorize the recovery by the defendants therein of the sum of $100 attorney's fees allowed by law, or does the dismissal of said action under said circumstances defeat such right?

[1, 2] When a complaint is filed, service of summons is not a necessary prerequisite to the right of the defendant to appear and defend such action. The summons duly served is simply a mandate requiring the appearance of said defendant in said action under penalty of having judgment entered for failure so to do. A defendant, who knows an action was pending against him, could proceed to retain counsel and begin the preparation of his defense to said pending action. If defendant has a right to appear in an attack upon an alleged cause of action after complaint filed, then he has a right to appear by attorney. Having such a right in a pending action presupposes his right to retain or employ such an attorney. The securing of the services of an attorney is, generally speaking, a matter of private contract.

The statute to be construed is the Act of March 23, 1872, and, so far as pertinent here, section 1 thereof refers to the requirement for the giving of a bond by plaintiff in a libel action. Section 7 thereof is as follows:

"7. In case plaintiff recovers judgment, he shall be allowed as costs $100, to cover counsel fees, in addition to the other costs. In case the action is dismissed, or the defendant recover judgment, he shall be allowed $100, to cover counsel fees, in addition to the other costs, and judgment therefor shall be entered accordingly."

[3-7] Where the defendant in a slander action employs an attorney and pays said attorney at least the sum of $100 and said attorney gives notice of motion to dismiss said action and plaintiff dismisses the action before the time set for the hearing of said motion, defendant is entitled to recover a judgment for $100 against plaintiff, as provided by said statute. Caffey v. Mann, 3 Cal. App. 124, 84 P. 424. In slander and libel actions it is not necessary in order to entitle the defendants to recover an attorney's fee that he move for a dismissal of the action on account of the failure on the part of plaintiff to file a bond as provided for by statute. The dismissals referred to in said statute are the dismissals generally as provided by section 581 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Neither is it necessary for a defendant to file a general appearance in an action to recover an attorney's fee where it appears that he employed an attorney to defend such action. The filing of a complaint in a libel action sets in motion the provisions of the statute and gives to the defendant the right to a counsel fee of $100 in the event of a dismissal in said action. Hills v. Shaffer, 96 Cal. App. 520, 274 P. 388. The defendant in a libel action when the same has been dismissed is entitled to recover $100 to cover attorney's fees under the terms of the statute, conditioned only upon two facts: First, that he has employed an attorney to defend against the action filed; second, that he has paid or agreed to pay a sum in at least the sum of $100 for such service. Hills v. Shaffer, supra.

[8] In the case at bar the record shows a notice of motion to enter judgment in favor of the defendants and against the plaintiff in the sum of $100 for attorney's fees, after the dismissal of said action. Said motion was granted and judgment was entered, and, from the judgment so entered, this appeal is prosecuted. There is no reporter's transcript of the proceedings taken and had in the trial court or bill of exceptions, and we must therefore assume that the evidence was sufficient to show that the defendants had employed attorneys to defend said action and that they had paid or agreed to pay a sum in at least the amount of $100 for the services of said attorneys in said action.

[9] All intendments are in favor of the judgment. Hind v. Oriental Products Co., Inc., 195 Cal. 655, 235 P. 438; Shannon v. Tooker, 167 Cal. 484, 140 P. 10. Appellant urges that in the instant case the filing of another complaint alleging libel in the identical terms of the original complaint, that had been dismissed, takes the instant case out of the application of the above rule.

[10] In the case at bar said action was dismissed on an order of the plaintiff. Upon said dismissal being filed, the action that had been instituted by the filing of the complaint therein ceased to exist, and the authority of the attorneys employed to defend against such action, that had been dismissed, terminated. The attorneys so employed would be and were without authority to represent the defendants in a subsequent action based upon the same cause of action, even though the same was identical in form, until the said attorneys were again authorized to represent the defendants in the new action filed. The filing of the new or second complaint instituted another action, even though identical in form, to the same extent as though the new or secand complaint had been based upon an entirely distinct state of facts and stating an absolutely different cause of action. The statute is plain, clear, and not ambiguous, and throughout uses the term "action," and imposes the penalty upon the dismissal of the action. We perceive no reason why the filing of a second action should defeat the purpose of the statute.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment is affirmed.

Rehearing Denied Jan. 14, 1931. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 9, 1931.

1. Wills ⇨223.

Contest of will after probate is limited to rights given by statute as to time, grounds, and persons, and Legislature may repeal or amend statute at any time.

2. Wills ⇨260.

Will contest instituted within one year after probate held within time, notwithstanding amendment shortening time to six months (Code Civ. Proc. § 1327; St. 1929, p. 860).

The will was admitted to probate October 30, 1928, at which time under Code Civ. Proc. § 1327, petitioners had one year within which to contest. The contest was filed October 28, 1929, which was within the year; but St. 1929, p. 860, shortening the time to contest will after probate to six months, went into effect on August 14, 1929.

3. Statutes ⇨267(1).

Statutes are not construed as retroactive to affect right of action already accrued unless such intent is expressly declared or necessarily implied.

4. Statutes ⇨271.

Code provisions as to retroactive construction apply to amendments to Code (Civ. Code, § 3; Code Civ. Proc. § 3; Pen. Code, § 3; Pol. Code, § 3).

5. Wills ⇨260.

Trial courts held to have jurisdiction to entertain will contest, even though limitations had run.

Even if limitations had run, the court would have jurisdiction to entertain the contest and make a binding order and judgment, in the absence of the interposition of the limitation statute.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Thomas F. Graham, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Susan Whiting, also known as Susan H. Whiting, deceased, in which Don Carlos Barrett was appointed executor. Petition by Charles H. Francis and another to revoke the probate opposed by the executor and Anita Haub Barrett and another. From judgment dismissing the petition, petitioners appeal.

Hearing denied by Supreme Court; SEAWELL, J., dissenting.

M. M. Getz, of San Francisco, for respondent John Miles Crouse.

PRESTON, Justice pro tem.

Susan Whiting died testate in San Francisco, Cal., on October 11, 1928, being a resident thereof at the time of her death and leaving an estate therein. After proper proceedings had, her will was admitted to probate in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco on October 30, 1928, and Don Carlos Barrett was appointed executor thereof, who immediately qualified and ever since has been and now is the executor of said estate.

On October 28, 1929, Charles H. Francis and Harry Whiting Francis, claiming to be sole surviving heirs of Susan Whiting, deceased, filed in said superior court a petition to revoke the probate of said will on the grounds of incompetency, undue influence, insane delusions, and that the will was not executed or published by decedent.

The executor and the devisees and legatees named in the will demurred to said petition and moved to dismiss same upon the following grounds, among others: (1) That the court was without jurisdiction to hear or determine said petition to revoke the probate of said will of said deceased; (2) that the petitioners were barred by the provisions of section 1327 of the Code of Civil Procedure, as amended in 1929 (St. 1929, p. 860).

The trial court sustained the demurrer, dismissed the petition, and entered an order and judgment to that effect. From this order and judgment the petitioners, Charles H. Francis and Harry Whiting Francis, prosecute this appeal.

[1, 2] Section 1327 of the Code of Civil Procedure, as it stood prior to the amendment of 1929, provided: "When a will has been admitted to probate, any person interested may, at any time within one year after such probate, contest the same or the validity of the will. * * * The amendment of 1929, among other things, shortened the time to contest a will after probate to six months. This amendment went into effect on August 14, 1929.

When Mrs. Whiting died, and at the time her will was admitted to probate (October 30, 1928), petitioners had, under section 1327, Code of Civil Procedure, as it then stood, one year after probate within which to contest her will. The contest was filed October 28, 1929—two days short of one year after the will was admitted to probate, but within two months and fourteen days after the amendment of 1929 to said section 1327, Code of Civil Procedure, became effective.

Respondents contend that: "When the amendment became effective on August 14, 1929, it became the law as to all petitions for revocation of probate thereafter filed, whether such probate was allowed before or after August 14, 1929, both as to the time of filing and as to the class of persons entitled to file."

Appellants, on the other hand, contend, among other things, that they had a full six months after the effective date of the amendment to section 1327, Code of Civil Procedure, within which to contest will and, therefore, their petition was filed in time.

The right to contest a will after probate is purely statutory; no such right existed under the common law. 40 Cyc. p. 1240. Therefore a contest after probate is limited to the rights given by the statute as to time, grounds, and persons, and the Legislature may repeal or amend the statute at any time.

The question is therefore, narrowed to this: When did the 1929 amendment of section 1327, Code of Civil Procedure, become effective so far as appellants' right to contest the will of Mrs. Whiting, after probate, is concerned? Or, in other words, when did the statute (section 1327, Code Civ. Proc.), as amended in 1929, begin to run with reference to the time within which appellants could contest the will? Was it from August 14, 1929, the effective date of the amendment, or from October 30, 1928, the date the will was admitted to probate?

The general rule applicable in such cases is pertinently stated by Mr. Wood in his work on Limitations, as follows (section 12): "If before the statute bar has become complete the statutory period is changed, and no mention is made of existing claims, it is generally held that the old law is not modified by the new, so as to give to both statutes a proportional effect; but that the time past is effaced, and the new law governs. That is, the period provided by the new law must run upon all existing claims, in order to constitute a bar. In other words, the statute in force at the time the action is brought controls, unless the time limited by the old statute for commencing an action has elapsed, while the old statute was in force, and before the suit is brought, in which case the suit is barred, and no subsequent statute can renew the right or take away the bar. * * *" See, also, Crothers v. Edison Electric Co. (C. C.) 149 F. 606; Swamp Land District No. 307 v. Glide, 112 Cal. 85, 44 P. 451, 452, and cases there cited; 16 Cal. Juris. 406; Nelson v. Nelson, 6 Cal. 430; Sohn v. Waterson, 17 Wall. 596, 21 L. Ed. 737.

In Swamp Land District No. 307 v. Glide, supra, Mr. Justice Henshaw, in considering a similar situation as we have in the case at bar, said: "But a man has no vested right in the running of the statute of limitations until it has completely run and barred the action; and, when a change in the statute is made during the time of its running, that time is not a credit to the defendant, under the new law. The whole period contemplated by the new law must lapse, to bar the action [italics ours]. Such are the general rules applicable alike to criminal and civil actions, unless the new act itself expresses a contrary intent."

Therefore, if the general rule, above stated, is to be applied to the amendment, appellants would have six months after the effective date thereof within which to file their contest, and, having filed their contest on October 28, 1929, were clearly within time.

On the other hand, if the Legislature intended that the amendment to section 1327, Code of Civil Procedure, should become effective on August 14, 1929, as to all petitions for revocation of the probate of wills filed after August 14, 1929, whether such wills had been admitted to probate before or after August 14, 1929, then appellants' time to contest said will began to run when it was admitted to probate (October 30, 1928) and expired six months thereafter and before appellants' contest was filed. This last interpretation of the amendment would give it a retrospective operation.

[3] It is a well-settled principle of statutory construction that, while the legislature has power to pass retroactive laws which do not impair the obligations of contracts or affect injuriously vested rights, it is equally true that statutes are not to be construed as intending to have a retroactive effect, so as to affect a right of action already accrued, unless such intent is expressly declared or necessarily implied from the language of the enactment. Williams v. Johnson, 30 Md. 500, 96 Am. Dec. 616; James v. Oakland Traction Co., 10 Cal. App. 785, 796, 797, 103 P. 1082; Greer v. Blanchard, 40 Cal. 197, 198; Gates v. Salmon, 28 Cal. 320, 321; Pignaz v. Burnett, 119 Cal. 157, 51 P. 48; Willcox v. Edwards, 162 Cal. 455, 123 P. 276, Ann. Cas. 1913C, 1392; Estate of Richmond, 9 Cal. App. 402, 99 P. 554; Montecito County Water Dist. v. Doulton, 193 Cal. 398, 224 P. 747; Vanderbilt v. All Persons, 163 Cal. 507, 126 P. 158; East Bay Municipal Utility Dist. v. Garrison, 191 Cal. 680, 218 P. 43; 36 Cyc. 1205; Bascomb v. Davis, 56 Cal. 152; Estate of Fries, 187 Cal. 150, 156, 201 P. 112; Estate of Parker, 200 Cal. 132, 141, 251 P. 907; State Commission in Lunacy v. Welch, 20 Cal. App. 624, 630, 129 P. 974; Endlich on the Interpretation of Statutes, p. 362; Jones v. Summers (Cal. App.) 286 P. 1093; Krause v. Rarity (Cal. Sup.) 293 P. 62.

In the Matter of Clyde E. Cate, etc., 207 Cal. 443, 279 P. 131, 133, Mr. Justice Richards said: "It is a canon of interpretation that statutes are not to be given a retrospective operation unless it is clearly made to appear that such was the legislative intention."

[4] The rule of construction above announced is not alone supported by the foregoing authorities and many others that could be cited, but the Legislature of this state has expressly prescribed certain rules of interpretation which reflect the general legislative policy of this state upon the question of the effect of legislation repealing or amending statutes upon rights of action which have accrued prior to the enactment of such legislation. Section 3 of the Civil Code contains the express provision: "No part of it [Civil Code] is retroactive, unless expressly so declared." A similar provision is found in section 3, Code of Civil Procedure; section 3, Penal Code, and section 3, Political Code, and this rule applies to the amendments to the Codes as well. Estate of Frees, supra; Sharp v. Blankenship, 59 Cal. 288; Central Pac. R. R. Co. v. Shackelford, 63 Cal. 261; Bank of Ukiah v. Moore, 106 Cal. 673, 680, 39 P. 1071; Estate of Richards, 133 Cal. 524, 527, 65 P. 1034; McKay v. Lauriston, 204 Cal. 557, 566, 269 P. 519; In the Matter of the Application of Cate, supra; People v. Allied Architects' Ass'n, 201 Cal. 437, 257 P. 511.

We have carefully read the 1929 amendment to section 1327, Code of Civil Procedure, and find no language contained therein that would give any intimation that the Legislature intended that said section should have a retrospective operation.

[5] The amendment under consideration does not take away the right to contest a will after probate, but merely limits the right of contest to persons of a certain class and shortens the time from one year to six months within which a contest after probate must be commenced. The right to contest under the new statute is the same as under the old; therefore there is no merit in respondents' contention that the trial court was without jurisdiction to entertain the contest. Even though the amendment be held to be retroactive, still the court would have jurisdiction to entertain a contest filed after the lapse of six months and make a binding order and judgment in the absence of the interposition of the six months' statute. The situation would be similar to a suit on a promissory note that was barred by the statute of limitations—the court would have jurisdiction to render judgment against the maker of the note if the statute of limitation be not interposed.

Respondents further contend that this case falls within the rule announced in such cases as Moss v. Smith, 171 Cal. 777, 155 P. 90; People v. Bank of San Luis Obispo, 159 Cal. 65, 112 P. 866, 37 L. R. A. (N. S.) 934, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 1148; Willcox v. Edwards, supra; Freeman v. Glenn County Telephone Co., 184 Cal. 508, 194 P. 705, and Chenoweth v. Chambers, 33 Cal. App. 104, 164 P. 428. An examination of those cases will show that the statutes involved had been repealed entirely, without a saving clause, or amended so that the cause of action upon which they were founded were entirely removed from the operation of the old law, either specifically or by necessary implication. Those cases are readily distinguishable from the case at bar. See Krause v. Rarity, supra.

As above stated, in the case at bar the right to contest after probate has not been taken away, but the time within which the contest should be filed has been shortened from one year to six months.

From what has been said, it follows that we are of the opinion that the contest of appellants was filed within time and that the order and judgment should be reversed, and it is so ordered.

SPEARS v. STATE BAR OF CALIFORNIA.

L. A. 12292.

Supreme Court of California.

Dec. 29, 1930.

1. Attorney and client ☞4.

Refusal to admit attorney to practice may be properly based on fact that he made false statements in affidavits accompanying application.

2. Attorney and client ☞4.

Applicant for admission to practice law must make full disclosure of any criminal charges preferred against him.

This is true regardless of whether there be conviction, acquittal, or dismissal of charges. A justification for failure to perform such duty is not to be found in excuse that applicant has been advised that such disclosure is not necessary, nor by argument that, charges having been dismissed, in effect no charges were preferred and applicant therefore is justified in stating no charges were in fact preferred.

3. Attorney and client ☞7.

Burden of establishing good moral character rests upon applicant for admission to bar.

4. Attorney and client ☞7.

Scope of investigation of moral character of applicant for admission to bar is wider than investigation to ascertain whether he has been convicted of offense or disbarred (Code Civ. Proc. § 287, subd. 5).

5. Attorney and client ☞7.

Committee of bar examiners held justified in refusing to recommend applicant for admission to practice law, in view of evidence.

Proof of applicant's moral character was not satisfactory, for, although committee had on file letters of recommendation testifying to good character of applicant, it also had letters which unqualifiedly and unequivocally stated that in writers' opinion applicant was not such a person. As to final disposition of charges which had been preferred against applicant, the committee had only the word of the applicant, which, in view of falsity of affidavits filed by him, they were entitled to consider as at least questionable.

6. Attorney and client ☞7.

Court will refuse to exercise power in contravention to adverse recommendation of committee of bar examiners unless applicant makes convincing showing that adverse recommendation was not based on sound premises and valid reasoning, though powers of committee are merely recommendatory, and not binding upon Supreme Court.

In Bank.

Application by Isaiah H. Spears to review an order of the Committee of Bar Examiners of the State Bar denying application for admission to practice on certificate from another state.

Application for admission denied.

Lyon, Fleming & Robbins and Charles W. Lyon, all of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

O'Melveny, Tuller & Myers, of Los Angeles, for respondent State Bar.

PER CURIAM.

Petitioner moves this court for an order admitting him to practice law as an attorney and counselor at law in all of the courts of this state notwithstanding the refusal of the committee of bar examiners to recommend him for admission.

The record which has been certified to this court discloses the fact that on or about April 26, 1929, petitioner herein made application in writing to the State Bar of California for admission as an attorney and counselor at law. This application was accompanied by the required certificate of the clerk of the Supreme Court of the state of Oklahoma, showing that applicant was admitted upon motion on March 20, 1916, to the Supreme Court of Oklahoma, that applicant at the date of said certificate was a member in good standing of said Oklahoma bar, and that no disbarment proceedings had ever been filed against him. The application was also accompanied by the required letters of recommendations by judges, attorneys, and former clients of the applicant. Petitioner also filed with the state board of bar examiners in support of his application a sworn affidavit in which he stated, among other things, "that affiant has never been charged before any court with crime amounting to either felony or misdemeanor involving moral turpitude."

The record also shows that previous to the date of this application, and on or about March 9, 1926, petitioner herein had made application in writing to the District Court of Appeal, Second Appellate District, for admission as an attorney and counselor at law. In support of this application, two separate sworn affidavits were filed by petitioner to the effect "that affiant has never been charged before any court with crime amounting to either felony or misdemeanor involving moral turpitude." The first affidavit was sworn to by petitioner before a duly qualified and acting notary public of the county of Tulsa, state of Oklahoma, and the second affidavit was sworn to before a duly qualified and acting notary public of the county of Los Angeles, state of California. Petitioner was absent from the state for a time subsequent to this application, and apparently it was never acted upon by the District Court of Appeal.

An oral hearing upon petitioner's last filed application was held by the committee of bar examiners on December 7, 1929, at which hearing it developed that the sworn affidavits accompanying the applications were not in fact true, for the reason that upon three and possibly four separate occasions petitioner had been charged with a crime amounting to either felony or misdemeanor involving moral turpitude.

At said oral hearing the petitioner herein admitted that in September, 1909, he was charged before the criminal court of record for the county of Escambia, state of Florida, in an information containing three counts, with the crime of "receiving and aiding in the concealment of stolen property, knowing it to have been stolen," with the crime of forgery, and with the crime of uttering forged paper. Upon the trial he was convicted on the second and third count, and sentenced upon the second count to be confined by imprisonment in the county jail at hard labor for a period of one year, and sentenced upon the third count to be confined by imprisonment in the county jail at hard labor for a period of three months. The judgment of said criminal court of record was thereafter reversed by the Supreme Court of Florida and a new trial granted principally on the ground that the evidence was not sufficient to justify the verdict. Spears v. State, 59 Fla. 44, 51 So. 815. According to petitioner, no new trial was had, but the charges against him were dismissed. At said hearing the petitioner also admitted that in 1923 or 1924 he had been charged before the district court of and for the county of Tulsa, Okl., with the crime of misappropriation of guardianship funds, that in 1926 he was charged before the United States commissioner at and in the county of Tulsa, Okl., with the crime of violation of the Mann Act, and that in 1927 he was charged with the crime of issuing a fictitious check. Petitioner explained to the committee of bar examiners his version of the circumstances leading up to the filing of these charges, and declared that each of them after a full hearing had been dismissed.

Subsequently on March 1, 1930, the committee of bar examiners made its findings and recommendation in the matter of said application and adopted its resolution that the application of petitioner herein for admission on motion to practice law in the state of California be denied. Petitioner thereafter moved this court for admission despite the adverse recommendation of said committee.

[1] In several cases in this state involving the same proceeding the holding has been that, where an attorney at the time of his application for admission has made a false affidavit, knowing it to be untrue, the fraud of the attorney has been established and his license has been revoked. In re Mash, 23 Cal. App. 692, 153 P. 961; In re Lasley, 61 Cal. App. 59, 214 P. 284; In re Holland, 96 Cal. App. 655, 274 P. 559; In re Jacobsen (Cal. App.) 287 P. 131; State Bar v. Hull (Cal. App.) 284 P. 492. Obviously, if the license of an attorney already admitted to practice may be revoked by reason of the fact that he made false statements in the affidavits accompanying his application for admission, a refusal to admit an attorney applying for an order admitting him to practice may be predicated upon the same offense.

[2] At the threshold of the discussion it should be stated as definitely settled in this state that, irrespective of the outcome of any charges preferred against an applicant for admission to practice law in this state, whether he be convicted, acquitted, or the charges dismissed, a duty rests upon said applicant to make a full disclosure of such charges to the committee charged with the duty and the responsibility of investigating his fitness to practice law in this state. We are aware that this requirement calls for a high degree of frankness and truthfulness on the part of the attorney making application for admission to practice law in this state, but no good reason presents itself why such a high standard of integrity should not be required. This duty to make a full disclosure is an absolute duty, and a justification for a failure to perform it is not to be found in the excuse that an applicant has been advised by some person, no matter how high in official position that person may stand, that such disclosure is not necessary, nor by the sophistic argument that the charges having been dismissed or the disbarment proceedings dropped, in effect no charges were preferred or proceedings instituted, and applicant is therefore justified in stating under oath that no charges were in fact preferred or proceedings for disbarment instituted. In re Jacobsen, supra.

[3, 4] It should be noted that the burden of establishing good moral character rests upon the applicant. It should also be noted that the scope of investigation of applicant's moral character is wider than an investigation by the committee of bar examiners to ascertain whether or not applicant has been convicted of an offense constituting a felony or misdemeanor, or whether he has in fact been disbarred in another state. Subdivision 5 of section 287 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which enumerates the causes for which an attorney may be removed or suspended, provides that " * * * in the event that such act shall constitute a felony or misdemeanor, conviction thereof in a criminal proceeding shall not be a condition precedent to disbarment or suspension from practice therefor." If conviction is not a condition precedent to disbarment or suspension, it is much less a condition precedent to a refusal to admit to practice.

In Re Wells, 174 Cal. 467, 163 P. 657, 660, this court said, Mr. Justice Shaw writing the opinion: "It is contended on behalf of the applicant that upon an attorney's application for admission the court cannot reject him for want of good moral character, unless it appears that he had been guilty of acts which would be cause for his disbarment or suspension. We think this proposition cannot be sustained. On his admission on certificate he must produce 'satisfactory evidence of good moral character.' The burden is on him to do this. In a proceeding to disbar an attorney the burden is on the accuser to prove moral turpitude. The requirement on his admission is to prevent the accrediting of untrustworthy persons as fit to receive the confidence attending upon the relation of attorney and client. The inquiry may extend to his general character as well as to particular acts. It is broader in its scope than that in a disbarment proceeding. The court may receive any evidence which tends to show his character for honesty, integrity, and general morality, and may no doubt refuse admission upon proofs that might not establish his guilt of any of the acts declared to be causes for disbarment." (Italics ours.)

Petitioner admits the falsity of the three affidavits executed by him and filed in support of his application, but alleges that he misunderstood the language of the affidavits and believed that the statement "charged before any court with crime amounting to either felony or misdemeanor involving moral turpitude" meant "charged with and convicted of" or "guilty of." He alleges that at the time of the filing of said affidavits he had in mind that he would be required to appear personally at a hearing of the committee of bar examiners, at which time he intended to disclose to the committee the fact that he had been charged with crime in the states of Florida and Oklahoma, at the same time explaining to them the circumstances surrounding the filing of said charges against him, and alleges that at said hearing before the committee of bar examiners he did in fact voluntarily disclose the fact that he had been on the various occasions hereinbefore referred to charged with said offenses.

Had the false statement occurred in but one affidavit, the explanation of applicant that he misinterpreted the phrase "charged with" to mean "charged with and convicted of" or "guilty of" would, perhaps, be credible. But the fact that the false statement was made under oath in three separate affidavits renders less plausible applicant's explanation that he misinterpreted it. It is difficult to believe that, the matter having been brought to his attention on three separate occasions, no doubt entered his mind as to what was the correct meaning of the statement which he was subscribing under oath. Furthermore, the explanation that at the time he filed his affidavits he had in mind that, at the hearing at which he would appear personally, he would divulge the former charges filed against him, is indicative that there was a doubt, at least, in his mind that his interpretation of the phrase "charged with" was correct.

However, the record does bear out applicant's contention that, in response to an inquiry from the member of the committee interrogating the applicant as to whether there was anything further reflecting upon applicant's character which the committee should know, applicant did make a voluntary disclosure to the committee of bar examiners of the charges filed against him as hereinbefore set out. This undoubtedly tends strongly to support applicant's claim that he had no intention of willfully deceiving the committee. The record, however, also discloses that, in the interim between the filing of the false affidavits by applicant and the date of the oral hearing, information had come into the possession of the committee of bar examiners to the effect that applicant had in fact been charged with the commission of a felony in an information filed in Florida and had been convicted. There were in fact on the date of the oral hearing two letters in the files of the committee of bar examiners derogatory to applicant's good moral character. One of these letters was from a former member of the bar of this state and now a member of the Oklahoma bar, who voluntarily wrote to the committee advising them that a thorough investigation should be made of applicant's previous record. The other letter was a response to a letter from the committee inquiring with reference to the former conviction of applicant. The record does not indicate that applicant at the time he gave the information with reference to his previous record was aware that the committee was in possession of this information. In the absence of such showing, we are inclined to accept as true, therefore, that, whatever may have been applicant's intentions at the date of the filing of the false affidavits, at the date of the oral hearing he did not intend to perpetrate a fraud upon the committee and subsequently upon this court by withholding information which might have a bearing upon the committee's recommendation.

[5] However, conceding for the sake of argument that applicant by a full and voluntary disclosure of his previous record thereby purged himself of the imputation of fraud which arose from the filing by him of a false affidavit, nevertheless, we are of the opinion that, although this phase of the case be entirely eliminated from consideration, the committee of bar examiners were entirely justified in refusing to recommend the applicant for admission to practice law in this state.

As stated in Re Wells, supra, the burden of establishing his good moral character is upon an applicant for admission. Although the committee of bar examiners will make as thorough an investigation as possible, they are not required to undertake the burden of disproving an applicant's allegations of good moral character. And if the proof offered by an applicant falls short of convincing the committee of bar examiners, it is their privilege and their duty to refuse to recommend such applicant for admission to the bar of this state.

An analysis of the proof offered by applicant shows that there is at least a question as to applicant's moral character. In other words, the proof offered is not satisfactory. Although the committee of bar examiners has on file letters of recommendation testifying to the good character of applicant and affirming that the writers thereof have found him to be honest, trustworthy, and a man of integrity, it also has on file letters which unqualifiedly and unequivocally state that in the writers' opinion applicant is not such a person. In addition to these contradictory letters, there exists the conceded fact that on four separate occasions applicant has been charged with the commission of a crime. As to the final disposition of these charges, the committee has only the word of applicant, which, in view of the falsity of the affidavits filed by him, they were entitled to consider as at least questionable. Considering the number and seriousness of the charges, a definite obligation rests upon applicant to attempt some showing in reference to them. Documentary evidence of the dismissal of the charges should be available to applicant or a showing made by him that he is unable to secure such proof. The record also shows that applicant in his replies to questions relative to these charges appeared to consider them of small moment. It was, perhaps, this attitude on his part which influenced the committee to refuse to recommend him for admission.

[6] While the powers of the committee of bar examiners are merely recommendatory and not binding upon this court, nevertheless, the committee of bar examiners was expressly created by statutory enactment for the definite purpose of relieving the court of the onerous duty of examining applicants for admission and investigating their fitness both as to legal learning and moral character to practice law in this state, and this court, recognizing this fact, will refuse to exercise its power in contravention to the adverse recommendation of the committee of bar examiners unless a convincing showing is made by the applicant to the court that such adverse recommendation is not based upon sound premises and valid reasoning.

The petitioner herein has failed to make such a showing, and his motion for an order admitting him to practice law in this state, notwithstanding the refusal of the committee of bar examiners to recommend him for admission, is therefore denied.

HULL v. RAY,

L. A. 10709.

Supreme Court of California.

Dec. 24, 1930.

Rehearing Denied Jan. 22, 1931.

1. Appeal and error ⇨1097(1).

Law as declared by appellate court on first appeal became law of case.

2. Sales ⇨127.

Buyer's notice of rescission of sale of cattle, although stating inadequate reason therefor, held sufficient to support action to rescind for adequate reasons known to seller.

It appeared that buyer had orally demanded delivery of bill of sale and warranty of title, and that seller's refusal thereof warranted rescission, in view of Civ. Code, § 1689; that at same time buyer offered to restore cattle, and attempted to rescind contract; and that notice of rescission, although it failed to mention bill of sale and warranty of title, did not mislead seller, who had been informed by correspondence and by allegations of complaint of real grounds for rescission.

3. Contracts ⇨271.

Notice of intention to rescind contract need not be formal and explicit, but is sufficient if clearly showing such intention.

4. Sales ⇨130(2).

In buyer's action to rescind cattle sale, issues concerning validity of resale by buyer as agister, and his lien for feed and care, being incidentally involved, held properly litigated.

It appeared that complaint expressly alleged that seller's refusal to accept return of cattle required buyer to give them feed and care, and that to satisfy his lien therefor, as provided by Civ. Code, § 3052, buyer exercised right of agister and sold cattle at public sale, which seller claimed was illegal.

5. Appeal and error ⇨1138.

Where issues, although deemed improper by defendant, were expressly pleaded and properly litigated, and evidence apparently fully developed, resubmitting issues held unnecessary.

It appeared that defendant had ample opportunity to produce witnesses, if he chose, to testify on issues in question; that there was no reasonable probability he could refute plaintiff's evidence; that case had been tried twice, and had been before three appellate courts; and that resubmission of issues would increase, rather than lighten, burdens of defendant.

Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; James L. Allen, Judge.

Action by John S. Hull against Carl Ray. A judgment for plaintiff was reversed by the Court of Appeal (287 P. 547), and the cause was taken to the Supreme Court on an order of transfer.

Judgment of Superior Court affirmed.

Scarborough, Forgy & Reinhaus, of Santa Ana, for appellant.

Sloane & Sloane, of San Diego, M. B. Wellington, of Santa Ana, and Harrison G. Sloane of San Diego, for respondent.

SEAWELL, J.

This appeal is taken from a judgment entered in favor of plaintiff and respondent whereby a sale of twenty head of Jersey cattle made to respondent by appellant for a consideration of $3,500 was adjudged rescinded. The respondent's offer to restore said cattle to the possession of appellant was rejected by him, and said cattle were subsequently sold by respondent for a sum less than the accrued charges incurred for their care and keep.

[1] This case received the attention of the District Court of Appeal some time ago (Hull v. Ray, 80 Cal. App. 284, 251 P. 810), where the facts are quite fully set forth. The law as therein declared is the law of the case. Judgment went for appellant herein, and a reversal was ordered because of irreconcilable findings on certain issues which in no wise affect the merits of the instant appeal.

[2] All of said cattle appear to have been blooded stock and to have been registered, except four. The court held upon the first appeal, in construing the contracts of the parties, which consisted of two instruments, that the appellant failed and refused to deliver a bill of sale of said stock to respondent transferring said four unregistered head of cattle and failed and refused to deliver written warranty of title to any of said property sold, and that said failure and refusal constituted a breach of contract and furnished grounds for rescission by respondent pursuant to section 1689, Civil Code. The court also held that respondent's claim that the failure or refusal of appellant to procure the transfer of registration of the blooded cattle upon the books of the American Jersey Cattle Club constituted grounds of rescission was untenable. The cause was retried, and judgment went for respondent. Upon appeal to the District Court of Appeal, Third Appellate District, 287 P. 547, the judgment was reversed, and the cause comes to this court upon an order of transfer. The principal reason for said transfer was to give further consideration to the conclusion reached by the learned author of the opinion to the effect that the notice of rescission was insufficient to support the action of rescission. The District Court of Appeal, upon a second consideration of the case, again found that the bill of sale and warranty of title was not executed; that respondent had fully performed all of the covenants on his part and had orally demanded of the appellant the delivery of the stipulated instruments, which demand was refused, and at the same time he offered to restore the cattle to appellant and attempted to rescind the contract. Pursuant to his purpose, respondent served upon the appellant a written notice of rescission containing the following language: "You will please be advised that John S. Hull does hereby rescind that certain contract of sale * * * [describing the same]. This rescission is made by reason of the failure of said Carl Ray to deliver to the said John S. Hull a certificate of the American Jersey Cattle Club, showing transfer of the said cattle, and by reason of the said Carl Ray's failure to correctly certify to the date of service to certain of said cattle." The notice fails to mention the appellant's failure to execute or deliver said bill of sale and warranty of title.

The trial court found that the contract was rescinded by the respondent on May 5, 1923, together with an offer to restore. The first sentence of the notice would have been sufficient on the question of rescission had the respondent not undertaken to specify the grounds of rescission. Inasmuch as he specified certain grounds which were not sufficient grounds and failed to specifically state the obvious grounds, to wit, failure to deliver or tender a good and sufficient bill of sale and warranty of title, the District Court of Appeal held the notice to be misleading and tending to deceive the adverse party and prevent him from defending the action on its merits.

We are aware that courts have in some species of transactions restricted the party specifically naming certain grounds of objections to proof of the grounds so named. The rule, however, is not to be strictly enforced in cases where a general clause, which would of itself be sufficient to grant relief if standing alone, is followed by untenable specific objections which may be treated as surplusage to the end that the cause may be decided on its merits; and further, if, as a matter of fact, the adversary has been informed both by correspondence and by the allegations of the complaint filed against him, as in this case, as to the real grounds upon which the rescission is made, he is not misled as to the defense he is called upon to make. The supplemental and amended complaint to which answer was made without objection, by demurrer or otherwise, squarely presented the issues as to the refusal to execute and deliver said bill of sale together with warranty of title. We think the rule stated in Simmons v. Briggs, 69 Cal. App. 447, 231 P. 604, 610, may here well be invoked in the light of the facts of the instant case. It is there said:

[3] "The allegation as to the notice of rescission is not as certain and clear as it might have been made. In McNeese v. McNeese, 190 Cal. 402, 405, 213 P. 36, 38, it is said: 'It is not necessary that the notice to rescind shall be formal and explicit; it is sufficient that notice shall be given to the other party which clearly shows the intention of the person rescinding to consider the contract at an end. It has been held in other states that the mere bringing of an action is a sufficient disavowance of a sale.'"

There can be no doubt as to the intention of the respondent herein to consider the contract at an end. Neither can there be any doubt as to appellant's knowledge before suit filed, and later by the complaint, that failure to execute and deliver said bill of sale and warranty of title would be relied upon as grounds for rescission, in addition to the insufficient ground set forth in the notice. We cannot see, in the circumstances of the instant case, that appellant suffered the slightest injury or prejudice by the inartfully drawn notice of respondent, which unmistakably expressed respondent's intention of rescinding the sale.

This brings us to the second branch of the case. The complaint further alleges that appellant's refusal to accept the return of the cattle made it obligatory upon him to feed and care for the same at an expense of $850, and, appellant having refused to reimburse him therefor, he exercised the right of an agister and sold the same at public sale on or about December, 1924, to satisfy his lien thereon, as provided by section 3052, Civil Code. By a supplemental pleading the expenses of caring for and feeding said cattle since suit filed to the day of sale was alleged to have amounted to $2,191.66. The cattle were purchased at said sale by respondent's wife at the price of $154, and were subsequently resold by her at private sale at prices aggregating a sum considerably in advance of the public sale price, but in no event sufficient to pay the charge of $2,191.66. No deficiency judgment was prayed for, and consequently none was awarded. The answer denies, inter alia, that said cattle were sold in accordance with legal proceedings.

[4, 5] There was much doubt in the mind of the trial court, shared by counsel for appellant at the trial, as to whether the validity of the sale and the items constituting the lien claim for feeding and caring for said cattle were triable in said action for rescission. The court seemed to be of the view that the expense of feeding and caring for the stock and the sale thereof to reimburse the respondent for his outlay was admissible only to excuse the inability of respondent to make delivery at the close of the trial, as they had passed out of his possession and into the possession of their purchasers. The pleadings expressly made the legality of sale and fairness of the lien claim issues in the case. Certainly, too, the issues were incidentally involved, and the parties should not be required to litigate issues in a separate action which are so closely correlated to the main issue as were said questions in the instant case. The court did find, after hearing considerable evidence on the issue, that the respondent was entitled to a lien, and that after proceedings had in accordance with law said cattle were sold, except one head thereof, in satisfaction of his lien, but the proceeds of such sale were insufficient to pay the amount of respondent's lien. The sources of evidence seem to have been exhausted as to the subject-matter, and there seems to be no reasonable probability that appellant can or could have refuted the evidence which tends to show that the lien sale price of said cattle was far below the costs of feeding and caring for said stock, which extended over a period of some eighteen or twenty months. Appellant had ample opportunity to produce such witnesses, if any there were, to rebut this testimony, but chose not to do so. This case has been twice tried and has been before three appellate courts. One of the parties is bound to sustain a loss. The respondent has paid to the appellant $3,500 for twenty head of cattle of questionable comparative value. Appellant, on the other hand, stands to lose his herd of twenty head. The trial court upon a full hearing determined the issues in favor of respondent. We feel satisfied that the evidence, by reason of the source from which it must be obtained, has been fully exploited, and that a resubmission of the issues of feeding and caring for said cattle would rather add to the already heavy burdens of the appellant than lighten them.

No other questions are raised which seriously affect the judgment.

Judgment affirmed.

HENRY COWELL LIME & CEMENT CO. v. STATE INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION.

S. F. 14028.

Supreme Court of California.

Dec. 24, 1930.

1. Master and servant ⇨415.

In absence of employer's agreement, commission held unauthorized on second hearing to consider evidence of physician and compensation claimant at first hearing, to which employer was not party.

2. Master and servant ⇨415.

Commission held unauthorized to consider physician's affidavit, not filed until after hearing and submission of compensation claim.

3. Master and servant ⇨398.

Subsequent permanent disability is "new and further disability" within Compensation Act, extending time for filing claim (St. 1917, p. 841, § 11(c)).

Seriousness of injury is frequently not at first apparent, and from its nature cannot be detected until considerable time has elapsed. In such cases, Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act, § 11(c), St. 1917, p. 841, requires claim to be filed within 6 months after compensation agreement or payment, but also permits claimant to sue within 245 weeks after injury, on ground that original injury has caused "new and further disability."

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "New and Further Disability," see Words and Phrases.]

4. Master and servant ⇨398.

Statute held to entitle claimant, within 245 weeks after injury, to seek compensation for permanent disability, notwithstanding prior award or voluntary payment for temporary disability (St. 1917, p. 841, § 11(c)).

5. Master and servant ⇨398.

Statute held not to require filing of claim for new and further disability within 6 months after claimant has become aware thereof (St. 1917, p. 841, § 11(c)).

6. Master and servant ⇨416.

Commission's finding that compensation claim is not barred by limitation is finding of fact.

7. Master and servant ⇨405(1).

Evidence held to warrant findings that injury to claimant's eye was apparently superficial, causing only temporary disability, but later resulted in permanent disability; hence compensation claim therefor was not barred by limitation (St. 1917, p. 841, § 11(c)).

Proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Insurance and Safety Act by Antone Cabral, claimant, opposed by the Henry Cowell Lime & Cement Company, employer. To annul an order of the Industrial Accident Commission granting an award, the employer applies for certiorari.

Award annulled.

Thelen & Marrin, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Edward O. Allen, of San Francisco, for respondent.

CURTIS, J.

Petitioner by this proceeding seeks to have annulled an award against it and in favor of Antone Cabral. Cabral was in the employ of petitioner as a farm laborer, and while so employed on June 1, 1928, sustained injury to his right eye, which resulted in complete loss of the sight of said eye. Immediately on being injured he was taken to a hospital where he received treatment for the injuries sustained by him, including the injury to his eye. He remained in the hospital some two weeks, but thereafter received regular treatments for his injury until August 28, 1928, when he was discharged. He was advised on or about September 1, 1928, by the attending physician to try to take up light work. He returned to the ranch of petitioner and was put at some light work, but soon found that he was unable to perform the work assigned to him. The petitioner paid the attending physician, Dr. Cowden, for his services in attending Cabral. This payment was made October 13, 1928. No other payment, either as compensation or otherwise, has been made by petitioner on account of the injuries sustained by Cabral. Cabral, on April 23, 1929, filed with the Industrial Accident Commission, his claim for compensation for the injuries sustained by him as aforesaid. This claim was filed against Henry Cowell only. A hearing was had thereon on August 29, 1929, and, after the introduction of the testimony of Cabral and the attending physician, the matter was submitted for decision. Prior to said hearing, and on or about July 11, 1929, the secretary of petitioner sent written notice to the Industrial Accident Commission that there was no such person as Henry Cowell against whom Cabral had attempted to file his claim before said commission, and that Henry Cowell had died in the year 1902. Apparently the commission paid no attention to this notice, but proceeded to hold the hearing on August 29, 1929, as stated above. It was not until March 7, 1930, that an order was made by the commission making the petitioner, the Henry Cowell Lime & Cement Company, a party to said proceeding. Thereafter, and on April 28, 1930, a further hearing in said proceeding was held, at which petitioner was present and interposed as a defense to the claim of Cabral that the same was barred by the statute of limitations, in that said proceeding had not been commenced against said petitioner within six months from the date of the last payment made by petitioner to said attending physician. At this further hearing additional evidence was taken before a referee, and, after the submission of the case, the referee made findings, and, based upon said findings an award was made in favor of Cabral which was thereafter confirmed by the commission.

The commission found that Cabral, while employed by the Henry Cowell Lime & Cement Company, sustained injuries arising out of and in the course of his employment when a team of horses which he was driving ran away, causing various injuries to his right eye, neck, and head, and that at the time both employee and employer were subject to the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act (St. 1917, p. 831), hereinafter referred to as the Workmen's Compensation Act. Finding 2 was as follows: "Defendant (the employer) paid medical expenses on account of aforesaid injury to the applicant. The injuries now complained of and which are the result of the aforesaid accident are permanent. The claim is, therefore, not barred by the statute of limitations." The remaining findings relate simply to the age of the employee; that the injury caused permanent disability consisting of loss of sight of right eye; the amount of wages the employee was receiving at the time of the injury; the compensation to which the employee was entitled; the fixing of a reasonable attorney's fee and future medical expenses. Leave was also reserved to the employee to file a new petition for increased permanent disability rating in the event that the permanent disability as found had increased and for any permanent condition which was not included in the rating fixed therein.

[1, 2] It was insisted by petitioner before the commission that Cabral's claim was barred by the statute of limitations. Petitioner now makes the same contention before this court. Independent, however, of the defense of the statute of limitations, we think the award must be annulled. As shown above, Cabral's claim was originally filed against Henry Cowell only, and the Henry Cowell Lime & Cement Company was not made a party to said proceedings until March 7, 1930. Before that date, and on August 29, 1929, the commission held a hearing at which the testimony of Cabral and that of Dr. Cowden was taken, and the matter was submitted to the commission for decision. Neither petitioner nor any one representing petitioner was present at said hearing. After the submission of the matter, the commission made an order bringing in the petitioner as a party to said proceeding, and a further hearing was had. No stipulation nor agreement was had relative to the evidence taken at the prior hearing. At this second hearing while Cabral and a witness, George, representing the petitioner, were called as witnesses and testified before the commission, Dr. Cowden was not called, and the only testimony given by him was at the first hearing. Without his testimony, the evidence before the commission was not sufficient to establish Cabral's claim. The commission, without an agreement or stipulation on behalf of petitioner permitting it to do so, had no authority or right to consider the evidence given by Dr. Cowden and Cabral at the first hearing when petitioner was not a party to said proceeding. Petitioner was not bound by said evidence. Carstens v. Pillsbury, 172 Cal. 572, 158 P. 218. Furthermore, the record before us shows that, after the close of the second hearing, and after the case had been submitted, there was filed with the commission an affidavit of Dr. Cowden to the effect that he had examined Cabral on the date of said affidavit, which was April 28, 1930; that he found him practically blind in his right eye; and that said injury was permanent in nature. This affidavit is quoted by counsel for the commission in support of the findings of the commission. It was evidently considered by the commission and relied upon by the commission in making up its findings. This affidavit was entitled to no weight as evidence, and should not have been given consideration by the commission. Pacific Coast Casualty Co. v. Pillsbury, 171 Cal. 319, 153 P. 24. Excluding the evidence taken at the first hearing and at a time when petitioner was not a party to said proceeding before the commission, and disregarding the affidavit of Dr. Cowden filed with the commission after the matter had been submitted for decision, the evidence before the commission was insufficient to support the findings, and for that reason the award must be annulled.

As this matter will in all probability again be brought before the commission, and as the parties hereto have devoted their arguments mainly to the question of whether or not the claim involved herein was barred by the statute of limitations, we consider it only proper to express our views upon the question thus presented and which, at least from the standpoint of counsel, appears to be the principal question involved in this proceeding. In discussing this phase of the case, we will assume that all of the evidence before the commission, both that taken at the first as well as that taken at the second hearing, and also the affidavit of Dr. Cowden filed after the submission of the matter, were properly before the commission for its consideration in arriving at said award.

By the provisions of section 11 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, proceedings for the collection of any benefit provided by the terms of said act (and this includes compensation for medical treatment and for temporary and permanent disability but not for death benefits) must be commenced within six months from the date of the injury, except as provided in said act. The only exception contained in the act to this six months' limitation is found in subdivision (c) of section 11, and is as follows: "The payment of compensation, or any part thereof, or agreement therefor, shall have the effect of extending the period within which proceedings for its collection may be commenced, six months from the date of the agreement or last payment of such compensation, or any part thereof, or the expiration of the period covered by any such payment; provided, however, that nothing contained in this section shall be construed to bar the right of any injured employee to institute proceedings for the collection of compensation within two hundred forty-five weeks after the date of the injury upon the grounds that the original injury has caused new and further disability; and the jurisdiction of the commission, in such cases, shall be a continuing jurisdiction at all times within such period; provided, further, that the provisions of this section shall not apply to an employee who is totally disabled and bedridden as a result of his injury, during the continuance of such condition or until the expiration of six months thereafter."

The facts in this case recited above show that Cabral did not file his application for compensation with the Industrial Accident Commission within six months of the date of the injury, nor did he file said application within six months after the payment by his employer of the doctor who attended him for his said injuries. He has, therefore, not brought himself within the terms of subdivision (c) of said section 11, unless his claim is saved by the terms of the proviso contained in said subdivision. This proviso, which we will again state, is to the following effect: "Provided, however, that nothing contained in this section shall be construed to bar the right of any injured employee to institute proceedings for the collection of compensation within two hundred forty-five weeks after the date of the injury upon the grounds that the original injury has caused new and further disability; and the jurisdiction of the commission, in such cases, shall be a continuing jurisdiction at all times within such period."

[3, 4] It was held in the cases of Hutchinson Lumber Co. v. Ind. Acc. Comm., 77 Cal. App. 141, 246 P. 118; General Accident, etc., Corp. v. Ind. Acc. Comm., 77 Cal. App. 314, 246 P. 570; and Ocean A. & G. Corp., Ltd., v. Ind. Acc. Comm., 90 Cal. App. 725, 266 P. 556, that a permanent disability is a new and further disability within the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Act. We are in full accord with this conclusion of the District Courts of Appeal. Many times the seriousness of the injury is not at first apparent, and from its very nature cannot be detected until considerable time has elapsed after its infliction. The clear intent of the statute in such cases is that the injured employee shall be entitled to compensation for his permanent disability notwithstanding the fact that he may in the early stages of his injury have been granted an award only for temporary disability, or may have been paid compensation voluntarily by his employer; provided, of course, that proceedings for the collection of such permanent disability shall have been commenced within two hundred and forty-five weeks after the date of the original injury.

It is conceded by petitioner that, in case an injured employee files within six months from the date of the injury an application for compensation for temporary disability, and the same is granted by the commission, said employee may, in case his disability becomes permanent, at any time within two hundred and forty-five weeks after the date of his original injury, present and file with the commission his application for further compensation on the grounds that the original injury has caused a new and further disability. This was undoubtedly the clear and unambiguous intent of said section 11 (c) of the Workmen's Compensation Act. We think it is also equally clear that, if the injured employee receives compensation for temporary disability by the voluntary payment thereof by the employer, instead of through a compulsory award by the Industrial Accident Commission, and thereafter his disability becomes permanent, he may at any time within two hundred and forty-five weeks from the date of his original injury institute proceedings before the commission for compensation on the grounds that the original injury has caused a new and further disability. This construction has been given to the statute by the courts in the following decisions: Employee's Credit Co. v. Ind. Acc. Comm., 177 Cal. 46, 169 P. 1001; Kauffman v. Ind. Acc. Comm., 37 Cal. App. 500, 174 P. 690; Anaheim Co-Operative Orange Ass'n v. Ind. Acc. Comm., 70 Cal. App. 168, 233 P. 1115; Hutchinson Lumber Co. v. Ind. Acc. Comm., 77 Cal. App. 141, 246 P. 118, 119; General Accident, etc., Corp. v. Ind. Acc. Comm., 77 Cal. App. 314, 246 P. 570, 572; Ocean A. & G. Corp., Ltd., v. Ind. Acc. Comm., 90 Cal. App. 725, 266 P. 556.

[5] There is an intimation in some of the decisions that the application based upon a new and further disability must be commenced within six months after the claimant had become aware of the fact that a new and further disability had developed, but this construction of section 11 (c) of the Workmen's Compensation Act is neither warranted by the language of the statute nor supported by authority. This contention was made in the case of Hutchinson Lumber Co. v. Ind. Acc. Comm., supra, but was resisted by the commission. The court held with the commission stating that "we are of the opinion that the position taken by the commission must be sustained. The statute specifies no such limitation of time for the filing of an application based upon a new and further disability." In General Accident, etc., Corp. v. Ind. Acc. Comm., supra, the court stated the correct rule in the following language: "However, in view of the language of section 11 (c) of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act (Stats. of 1917, p. 831, as variously amended), it would appear that, if the injuries received in the first accident 'caused new and further disability,' the question of the date when the permanent disability of Robinson was first determined would be immaterial, so long as the proceedings to have his claim adjusted were instituted within 245 weeks after the date when the first injury was sustained."

Applying the statute as thus construed to the facts in the present proceeding, it is apparent that Cabral's claim was not barred by the statute of limitations, provided he sustained a new and further disability from his original injury. The uncontroverted facts show that his employer, the petitioner herein, made payment of compensation by settling Cabral's medical bills on October 13, 1928, Cabral filed his claim with the Commission on April 23, 1929, and the petitioner herein was made a party to said proceedings on March 7, 1930, considerably less than two years from the date of the original injury, and therefore well within the period of two hundred and forty-five weeks from said date.

[6] Petitioner, however, contends that Cabral sustained no new or further disability from his original injury, for the reason that said injury was permanent from its inception, or, as petitioner states its case, ab initio. If petitioner is correct in this statement that Cabral's injury was permanent at the date of its infliction, then the contention that his claim is barred by the statute of limitations must be sustained. For the right to file a claim within two hundred and forty-five weeks is given only in case the injured employee sustains a new and further disability, and not necessarily for a permanent disability. It is only when there is a change in the condition of the original injury from a temporary to a permanent disability that a "new and further disability" is established. Therefore, if the injury is permanent ab initio, no such changed condition can ever take place. Petitioner contends that this is the situation in the present proceeding relative to Cabral's injury—that is, that his injury at the date it was received was permanent, and therefore no new or further disability has been established. The commission found that Cabral's disability was permanent, but failed to find when it became permanent. From this finding it cannot be determined whether the injury was permanent at the date it was received or whether it became permanent at some future date. If the findings stopped here, we would be compelled to hold that they were not sufficient to sustain the award. But the commission further found that Cabral's claim was not barred by the statute of limitations. This is a finding of fact. 16 Cal. Jur. 633, and cases there cited. The only hypothesis upon which the commission could have found that Cabral's claim was barred by the statute of limitation was to find that the disability caused by his original injury was permanent in the first instance, and therefore no new and further disability had been shown. By finding that his claim was not barred by the statute of limitations, the commission, at least impliedly, found that the disability resulting from his injury was not permanent ab initio, but that originally it was temporary and later developed into a permanent disability. If this implied finding is sustained by the evidence, then the award is immune from attack in so far as said attack is based upon the statute of limitations.

[7] After a thorough consideration of the evidence, we are convinced that it is sufficient to justify the findings of the commission. The record before the commission, which has been certified to this court, shows that the ball of Cabral's right eye apparently received only superficial injury at the time of the accident. It was in no way destroyed. Dr. Cowden, who attended Cabral at the hospital and afterwards, testified that Cabral had a laceration of the inner side of the right eye; that at the time he was first called to attend Cabral at the hospital Cabral's eyes were full of dirt and whatever he could pick up in the field; that he cleaned out the eye and took stitches in the eye, lip, and ear; that there was no evidence of any permanent injury at the time he was hurt; that the wounds healed and the eye cleared up all right by the time Cabral left the hospital, and that he never heard Cabral say anything about the vision in his eye, nor complain of his eye. The doctor later filed an affidavit that he had examined Cabral after the application had been filed with the commission and that he found Cabral to be practically blind in his right eye. Cabral testified that his sight in his right eye before the accident was good and that up to that time he had never had any trouble with his eyes. He further testified at the time of the hearing as follows:

"Q. How is your eye (right)? Can you see out of it? A. No. I no see good. All foggy.

"Q. Was your eye good before the accident? A. Yes.

"Q. Just the same as the other eye? No answer.

"Q. Can you see out of it? Put your hand over your left eye and tell me what you can see. A. Just figures—heavy fog—just some.

"Q. Can't recognize me? A. No.

"Q. Could you recognize the doctor with your left eye closed? A. No (distance of about three feet)."

He was not asked and it is not shown when the loss of vision in his right eye occurred, and whether it was gradual or all at once. But the fact that the doctor testified that there was no evidence of any permanent injury to the eye resulting from the accident, and that he detected nothing wrong with Cabral's vision, and that Cabral made no complaint to the doctor while the latter was attending him for some four or five months after the accident, is most persuasive that the original injury to Cabral's eye was apparently superficial and caused only temporary disability.

The evidence is without conflict that at the time of the hearing, at least, and subsequent thereto, the vision in Cabral's right eye was practically gone. The evidence, therefore, upon the whole was ample, in our opinion, to support the commission in finding that the injury to Cabral's eye was at the first only temporary, but that later the condition of the eye changed to that of a permanent injury. This brought Cabral's claim clearly within the rule established by section 11 (c) of the Workmen's Compensation Act as one founded upon a new and further disability. It was therefore not barred by the statute of limitations prescribed by said act.

For the reasons, however, heretofore given, the award is annulled.

NEW YORK INDEMNITY CO. et al. v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION et al.*

S. F. 13954.

Supreme Court of California.

Dec. 29, 1930.

Rehearing Granted Jan. 26, 1931.¹

1. Master and servant ⇨417(7).

On review of award allowing compensation, Supreme Court must determine whether there is any substantial evidence supporting finding of Industrial Commission that applicant was employee.

2. Master and servant ⇨417(7).

In reviewing award of compensation, Supreme Court need not determine whether it would have arrived at same conclusion as commission.

3. Master and servant ⇨405(2).

Evidence of organization established to distribute newspapers through newsboys justified Industrial Commission's conclusion that publishers retained power of control over newsboys as to characterize them "employees" within Compensation Act (St. 1917, p. 835, § 8(a, b)).

Evidence disclosed that newspaper publishers employed district manager to distribute newspapers to newsboys at fixed price under conditions specified by publishers. Newsboys were not carried on pay roll by newspaper publishers and received no salary or reward directly from them; compensation of newsboys consisting only in difference between cost of papers and the price newsboy was permitted to charge purchasers. Specified corners were allotted to newsboys by district manager, and newsboys were instructed not to interfere with any other newsboy's corner, and were further required to sell prescribed possible minimum of papers or have corner turned over to another newsboy.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Employee," see Words and Phrases.]

4. Master and servant ⇨417(7).

Finding of Industrial Commission, justified by evidence, is conclusive (St. 1917, p. 835, § 8(b)).

5. Master and servant ⇨367.

That newsboys were not paid wages but depended for compensation on sales of newspapers was immaterial in determining whether they were employees of publisher, if other necessary elements were present (St. 1917, p. 835, § 8(a, b)).

6. Master and servant ☞361.

Newsboys held not precluded from recovering compensation for injuries as employees of publishers because not performing personal service (St. 1917, p. 835, § 8(a), b).

E. Herbert Herlihy and F. George Herlihy, both of Los Angeles, for petitioners.

Edward O. Allen, of San Francisco, for respondent Industrial Accident Commission.

Flint & MacKay and Edward L. Compton, all of Los Angeles, for respondent Evening Herald Pub. Co.

PER CURIAM.

Petition to review and annul an award of the Industrial Accident Commission in favor of the respondent Claude Eustace. This respondent, a man of 34 years, was engaged in selling Los Angeles Evening Heralds and Los Angeles Records on the streets of the city of Los Angeles. He was injured while in the act of selling a paper to a customer who had hailed him from a passing automobile.

No question is raised as to the correctness of any finding made by the commission except the finding that the vending on the streets of Los Angeles of these newspapers by the applicant, Claude Eustace, constituted him a compensable employee of the respective publishers thereof, the respondents Los Angeles Evening Herald and Los Angeles Record Publishing Company. The review on this ground alone is asked by the petitioners, who are the insurance carriers for the last-named respondents.

[1] It becomes necessary, in accordance with well-established rules, to determine whether there is any substantial evidence to support the finding of the commission that the applicant was an employee of the newspaper publishers, for, if he was an employee, he is concededly entitled to compensation. If, however, the evidence is capable of but one inference, viz. that the injured man was an independent contractor, as contended by the petitioners herein, he is not entitled to compensation.

Eustace is one of a number engaged in the same occupation in Los Angeles under circumstances similar to those here presented. The undisputed evidence, in substance, is that both the Heralds and the Records were delivered to persons usually called newsboys, of whom Eustace was one, by a district manager, who acted as the representative of both publishing companies in the distribution of the newspapers to the newsboys in his district. The newsboys paid 2 cents each for the Heralds, which were sold by them at a price fixed by the publishers thereof. The newsboys paid $1.25 per hundred for the Records, which they sold also at a fixed price. Eustace took from the district manager a specified number, 130, of Heralds per day, but received as few or as many Records as he wished. Unsold Heralds were not returnable, but credit was given by the district manager for Records returned. The papers were paid for by the newsboys when they received them, or they were charged with the number taken and payment was made at the end of the day. Eustace was not carried on the pay roll of either publisher, and received no salary or reward directly from them. His compensation consisted in the difference between the cost of the papers to him and the price he was permitted by the publishers to charge the public as purchasers.

Although there is some dispute in the testimony as to just what control or regulation was exercised over the newsboys by the district manager, nevertheless the following conclusions of fact are supported by testimony in the record, some of which was elicited from conceded employees of the publishing companies: That specified "corners" were allotted to the applicants therefor, who received instructions not to interfere with or sell at another newsboy's corner; that in order to retain his selling station at the corner allotted to him, a newsboy was required to be a "hustler" and sell a prescribed possible minimum of Heralds for that corner, otherwise his corner was given to another newsboy and he was refused further copies of that paper by the district manager. If copies were distributed for sale to newsboys who were not allotted a corner, they were instructed to sell only between corners and not to interfere with any occupied corner. The circulation manager of the Herald testified that it was one of the duties of the district manager, who is admittedly an employee of both publishers, to try to keep peace among the boys, and that some regulation was enforced as to the stations which the boys were to occupy in vending the papers, that the district manager had personal supervision of the newsboys, and that it was the duty of the district manager to see that all of the territory in his district was covered by newsboys so that the greatest possible number of copies each day would be sold.

[2-6] The question before us is not whether this court would have arrived at the same conclusion as that reached by the commission, but whether the evidence reasonably justifies the inference drawn by the Commission that the newsboys were employees entitled to the benefits of the act. We cannot escape the conclusion that the evidence was sufficient to justify the commission in concluding that such a system of distribution was established and such an organization built up to effect control of those selected to aid in obtaining the largest possible circulation by the particular means employed as to amount in effect to a complete exercise or retention of control of the activities of the newsboys to the end that the desired result be accomplished and thus satisfy the tests laid down in well-known cases. Globe Ind. Co. v. Ind. Acc. Comm., 208 Cal. 715, 284 P. 661; Moody v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 204 Cal. 668, 269 P. 542, 60 A. L. R. 299; Hillen v. Ind. Acc. Comm., 199 Cal. 577, 581, 582, 250 P. 570; Archbishop v. Ind. Acc. Comm., 194 Cal. 660, 230 P. 1; Brown v. Ind. Acc. Comm., 174 Cal. 457, 163 P. 664; Western Ind. Co. v. Pillsbury, 172 Cal. 807, 159 P. 721; Ocean Acc., etc., Corp. v. Ind. Acc. Comm., 87 Cal. App. 290, 262 P. 38. That being so, this court is powerless to set aside the finding of the commission that Eustace was as employee entitled to compensation. Hillen v. Ind. Acc. Comm., supra, page 580 of 199 Cal., 250 P. 570; Archbishop v. Ind. Acc. Comm., supra; Western Pac. R. R. Co. v. Ind. Acc. Comm., 193 Cal. 413, 224 P. 754; *Tartar v. Ind. Acc. It cannot therefore be said as a matter of law that the inference drawn by the commission is not supported by the evidence or that it is so unreasonable as to be an act in excess of the commission's jurisdiction. It was said in Hillen v. Industrial Accident Commission, 199 Cal. 577, at page 580, 250 P. 570, 571, citing Eastman Co. v. Ind. Acc. Comm., 186 Cal. 587, 598, 200 P. 17: "Unless there is such an entire absence of evidence in the record as to render the finding unreasonable, or in excess of the powers of the commission, the court is not empowered to set it aside." The fact that the newsboys are not paid a salary or wages, but depend upon the number of sales made for any return for their efforts is immaterial, if other necessary elements be present. Globe Indemnity Co. v. Ind. Acc. Comm., 208 Cal. 715, 284 P. 661; Hillen v. Ind. Acc. Comm., 199 Cal. 577, 581, 250 P. 570. Neither are we convinced that there is any merit in the argument that the newsboys are not performing a "personal" service. It must be obvious that any salesman who is hired to vend his employer's product, provided the evidence sufficiently supports the conclusion that the elements of control are present, is performing a personal service. See Easton v. Ind. Acc. Comm., 34 Cal. App. 321, 167 P. 288. The petitioners' claim that the facts present no more than a case of the purchase of a certain number of papers at wholesale for sale at retail is not supported by the record. The petitioners have not met the burden placed upon them by section 8(b) of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act (St. 1917, p. 835) of overcoming the presumption that the applicant is an employee entitled to the benefit of the act. See York Junction T. & S. Co. v. Ind. Acc. Comm., 202 Cal. 517, 261 P. 704; Montezuma Mt. School v. Ind. Acc. Comm., 201 Cal. 603, 258 P. 84; Hillen v. Ind. Acc. Comm., supra; Employers' L. A. Corp. v. Ind. Acc. Comm., supra.

We must therefore conclude on the present record that the system instituted and the organization established for the purpose of supervising and directing the largest distribution and sale of their papers on the streets by the class of news vendors involved herein justified the commission's conclusion that the petitioners' assured retained such powers of control over the class of newsboys so drawn into that system and organization as to characterize them employees within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act.

The award is affirmed.

RICHARDS, J.

There are two appeals herein, one by the defendant from that portion of the judgment which is in the plaintiff's favor, and one by the plaintiff from the portion thereof in the defendant's favor. Our main consideration will be given to the first of the foregoing appeals. The action is one to quiet title to certain portions of the Guadaluasca rancho, situate in the county of Ventura, to which the plaintiff, as the owner of the larger portion of said rancho, also claims title, the complaint being in the usual form employed in such actions. There are two separate parcels of land described in the complaint. The first of these, and the one awarded by the judgment to the plaintiff, lies along the southeasterly line of said rancho, and if confirmed to plaintiff will have the effect of defining the southeastern boundary of the plaintiff's property as extending throughout the entire length thereof to the ocean. The other piece or parcel of land lies along the most easterly line of said rancho and with it we shall, if necessary, deal later. In the year 1836 Mariano Chico, Mexican Governor of Alta California, upon the petition of Isabel Yorba, described as a widow with four adopted children, granted to her the rancho then known as "Guadaluasca," with no other description thereof than that supplied by a map which accompanied her petition. In this first grant there was expressly excepted therefrom a certain considerable tract of land which the Mission of San Buenaventura was then using for the pasturage of the mission cattle. A year later, it being made to appear that the mission had ceased to use this latter tract of land, another grant was issued by Governor Juan B. Alvarado to Isabel Yorba, which included these latter lands in the rancho Guadaluasca. The maps accompanying each of these grants de-pic the granted lands as extending on their southeastern side to the ocean and as being bounded on that side by the cost and sierra (costa y sierra); the "costa" thus referred to being, evidently, that portion of said boundary which then consisted and still consists of a sandy beach extending for a considerable distance along the seashore, and the "sierra" being a steep bluff which at the southerly end of said beach rises abruptly from the waters of the ocean to the height of several hundred feet and extends along the remainder of said depicted boundary line as shown upon said maps.

In the year 1852, the Mexican War having in the meantime been fought and having resulted in the acquisition of Alto California by the government of the United States by conquest, and also by the terms of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo (9 Stat. 922); and the said government having by act of Congress of March 3, 1851 (9 Stat. 631) created a commission "to ascertain and settle the private Land Claims in the State of California," Isabel Yorba on February 5, 1852, presented to said commission her petition for the approval and confirmation to her of her aforesaid grants of the rancho Guadaluasca. The commission held hearings upon her said petition and the proofs offered in support thereof, but finally, and on April 24, 1854, refused to confirm said grants upon the ground of insufficiency in the description; whereupon Isabel Yorba took an appeal from the ruling of the commission to the United States District Court in the manner provided for under the terms of said act; and said court, after full consideration of the proofs offered in support thereof, including the map or maps upon which the petitioner relied for a description of said rancho, reversed the action and order of the commission, and adjudged and decreed the claim of the petitioner to the lands embraced in said rancho to be good and valid, and that the same should be confirmed to her to the extent of eleven leagues of land within the boundaries called for in the grant of Governor Juan B. Alvarado of the date of April 6, 1837, and described in the map to which said grant refers. An amended decree was filed on March 3, 1857, which does not materially alter the former decree, but which, after referring to the grants made by Governors Chico and Alvarado, decrees that "the said lands have the boundaries shown by the respective grants and maps to which reference is made for a more particular description." Accompanying these decrees and filed with them in the office of the commission for the settlement of private land claims in California, as giving direction to the future action of said commission, is to be read the opinion of the judge of said District Court, which furnishes some interesting data as to the description of said rancho as the same is shown upon said maps and as a guide to the commission in the issuance of a patent confirming said grants. The court says: "The map in this so far as my experience goes is remarkably definite and distinct and is accompanied by notes made upon it explaining with great certainty the situation of the tract. The note upon the map states the commencement of the survey was at the Punta de Muju; this point is shown upon the map as being the southern corner of the tract; the southeastern side is described as running along the coast and the mountains which are laid down upon the map, and being in extent three leagues, thus then a point on the coast three leagues from the Punta de Muju forms the second corner." In view of the fact that Punta de Muju is a high perpendicular bluff rising directly from the waters of the sea, and that the "mountains" or sierra which extend from it along the shore to where the sandy beach begins partakes of its rugged and perpendicular character, it would seem to be obvious that this intended boundary line between the two described corners, each "on the coast," was, in the view of the court, to be a meander line following the seashore from corner to corner. In the later portion of the opinion this is made even more clear, the opinion stating: "The side which looks to the southeast faces the seashore and mountains and is three leagues in length. This side is also well defined, as it begins at Punta de Muju and runs along the seashore and sierra in a southeasterly direction three leagues." The transcript of the record of the District Court embracing the foregoing decrees having been filed in the General Land Office pursuant to the terms of the foregoing act of Congress, and no appeal having been taken therefrom, the General Land Office proceeded, through the Surveyor General's office, to have the Guadaluasca rancho surveyed and a proper description, map, and plat made thereof as preliminary to the issuance of a United States patent thereto. A survey thereof was accordingly made by one J. E. Terrell, a deputy surveyor, which survey, with accompanying map and plat, was in due course filed in the General Land Office. Thereafter and on September 1, 1873, a patent was duly issued to Isabel Yorba, purporting to describe and grant to her the rancho Guadaluasca. The description of said rancho corresponds with and in fact exactly copies the description thereof contained in the field notes of the survey thereof as made by said J. E. Terrell. The map of said rancho which is embraced in said patent is a copy of the map thereof which was drawn in the office of the Surveyor General by some cartographer who prepared the same supposedly from the field notes of the Terrell survey. Whatever defects and uncertainties may be found to have existed in the Terrell survey, and whatever differences may appear to exist between the field notes thereof and the map which was prepared and inserted in said patent, supposedly in conformity with the Terrell survey, were not discovered either by the grantee of said patent or by any one else until some years after the date of said patent and the entry of said grantee into completed ownership and possession of the Guadaluasca rancho pursuant to the issuance unto her of the patent thereto. In the meantime, and both before and after the issuance to her of said patent, Isabel Yorba had been making conveyances of undivided portions of said rancho to various grantees, with the effect that in the year 1874 Wolf Kalisher and Henry Wartemberg, who were grantees mediately from Isabel Yorba of a certain portion of said rancho, commenced an action in partition against a number of other grantees of undivided portions thereof in the then district court of the first judicial district of the state of California. In said action commissioners were appointed to make such partition, and John T. Stow was selected to make the requisite survey of the rancho.

The report of the commissioners introduced in evidence herein sheds an interesting light upon the inadequacies of the Terrell survey. The report states: "The first work that presented itself to the commission in the field was to retrace and establish the boundary lines of the rancho as called for in the official survey made in January, 1861, by J. E. Terrell, United States Deputy Surveyor, but upon endeavoring to do so very grave errors were found to exist in said survey, so much so that it was found impossible to run the lines as called for in the official survey. The official survey called for, however, certain unmistakable landmarks and the commission was governed by these in relocating the lines of the rancho." The commission in its said report proceeded to point out specifically the errors and inaccuracies of the Terrell survey and map, chief among which was that of the course along the shore of the ocean which, if attempted to be followed according to the calls of the survey, would place the southeasterly boundary of the rancho at least half a mile out in the ocean and would continue the same for practically the entire distance between the points Q3 and Q4 as designated upon the field notes and plat of said survey.

The report of the commission, however, adopted the location of Q4 as shown both by the field notes and plat of the Terrell survey as having been originally established "on the top of ridge near the shore of the Pacific Ocean," and adopted as the southeasterly boundary of the rancho between points Q3 and Q4 a meander line following the shore between said points. The report of this commission was carried into the decree of the court fixing the ocean shore as forming the southeasterly boundary of the rancho for the purpose of said partition suit. The discovery of the errors and discrepancies in the Terrell survey and of the fact that these had been carried into the patent of the rancho had the effect of disclosing that apparently there existed along the southeasterly boundary thereof a strip of land of varying width lying between a straight line drawn between points Q3 and Q4, as shown upon said plat, and the ocean shore, and hence not included within the boundaries of the rancho. The result was that various persons began occupying portions of this outlying strip of land and insisting that the federal government should undertake another survey of that portion of said rancho with a view to opening to settlement and acquisition this alleged strip of public land. As a result of this agitation the federal government designated one J. R. Glover, a deputy United States surveyor, to make a resurvey of the Guadaluca rancho in the year 1896. In carrying out this commission Glover claimed to have rediscovered the lost monument Q4 as set in the course of the Terrell survey and to have replaced the same, but this monument, instead of being "close to the seashore," as described in the field notes of Terrell, was located by Glover as being situate about 1,400 feet distant from the then shore line, which discrepancy he explained by his surmise that the shore line had been changed by accretion since the making of the Terrell survey. However, Glover, in making and reporting his survey, with its accompanying plat, stated and showed upon the latter that he regarded the ocean to be the true boundary of the rancho, and hence extended the eastern line thereof from his said station at Q4 to the seashore, thus making the boundary as between Q4 and Q3 practically a meander line along the sierra and shore. In the year 1910, at the instance of the defendant, or his predecessors in interest occupying the two strips of land claimed to lie outside of the established boundaries of the Guadaluca rancho, the United States government deputed a deputy surveyor named Lightwood to make surveys of these disputed strips of land. In so doing Lightwood accepted the location of station Q4 as claimed to have been remade by Glover, and, based thereon, returned to the United States General Land Office a plat and survey approved by the Surveyor General; whereupon and in the following year the lands embraced therein were opened to settlement and purchase as government lands; and thereafter and in about the year 1914 patents thereto were issued to the predecessors of the defendant herein. In the meantime, William Richard Broome having acquired by mesne conveyances the title of the original grantee, Isabel Yorba, to a large tract of the lands of said rancho, constituting the easterly portion thereof, and thereafter having died and his estate having been duly probated, and having by decrees of the superior court in and for the county of Ventura been duly distributed in undivided portions thereof as to said real estate unto his widow and heirs, the plaintiff herein, as one of said heirs, in the year 1914 commenced an action in partition of said lands then known as the "Broome Estate Ranch." In the course of said action referees were duly appointed by the said court to make or cause to be made a survey of said last-named premises and to partition the same among the persons entitled thereto in severalty, as a result of which the plaintiff herein, either by virtue of the decree of partition therein entered or of conveyances from his co-owners, became and at the time of the institution of the present action was and still is the owner of all or a major portion of said Broome Estate ranch property and of all such portions thereof as are legally embraced within the boundaries of the Guadaluca rancho.

Thereafter and in the year 1925 the present action was begun. The defendant, upon being duly served with process, appeared and demurred to the amended complaint of the plaintiff herein upon several grounds, but chiefly upon the ground that a sufficient cause of action was not therein stated. This demurrer being overruled the defendant answered, denying the averments of the plaintiff's amended complaint, pleading the statute of limitations and also setting forth affirmatively his own claim of title to the lands in dispute. The cause proceeded to trial upon the issues as thus framed, whereupon the trial court, basing its action in so doing upon the theory that the original description and boundaries of the Guadaluca rancho were so far indefinite as to the location of the southeasterly line thereof with relation to the ocean as to permit the introduction of extraneous evidence for the purpose of establishing said southeasterly boundary line, admitted at the plaintiff's instance and over the defendant's objection a large amount of such evidence, consisting in the main of the several surveys and maps of the Guadaluca rancho which had from time to time been made and which are above adverted to, and also in the admission of testimony on the part of several surveyors who had upon various occasions made investigations, comparisons, and surveys with respect to the rightful location of said boundary line. Upon the conclusion of the plaintiff's case the defendant moved for a nonsuit, basing his contention that the said motion should be granted upon the points urged upon his demurrer and upon the many objections which he had urged against the admission of the foregoing evidence offered upon the plaintiff's behalf. The trial court overruled said motion. The defendant then proceeded to offer his evidence in support of his affirmative pleadings, and thereafter and upon the final submission of the cause the trial court filed its findings of fact and conclusions of law, wherein it found and decided that as to the lands in dispute lying along the southeasterly line of said rancho upon the ocean side the plaintiff was the owner thereof and was entitled to have his title quieted thereto, but that as to the lands in dispute lying along the easterly side of said rancho the defendant was the owner thereof and was entitled to have his title quieted thereto as against the asserted claims of said plaintiff. Judgment was entered accordingly. Each of the parties have appealed from that portion of the judgment which is in favor of the other. The plaintiff, however, has set forth in his briefs upon appeal that, if the determination of this court shall upon the defendant's appeal be in the plaintiff and respondent's favor, affirming the judgment as to the portions thereof so appealed from, he will waive the further prosecution of the appeal taken on his own behalf and consent to an affirmance of that portion of said judgment from which he has appealed. We shall at present only consider the defendant's appeal.

[1] The defendant's first contention upon his said appeal is that the trial court was in error in overruling his demurrer to the plaintiff's amended complaint upon the ground that a cause of action was not therein set forth. The basis of this contention is that, since the plaintiff's alleged title to the portion of the Guadalupe rancho owned by him is founded upon the patent to said rancho, and not otherwise, and since that description and boundaries of said rancho as set forth in said patent are not ambiguous or uncertain, but, on the contrary, clearly show that the lands to which the plaintiff is by this action asserting title are outside of said boundaries, he has for that reason failed to state a cause of action. The vice of the defendant's contention in the foregoing regard is that it disregards the very fact in dispute in this action, viz., the uncertainty and ambiguity of the patent boundaries and description, based as they are, upon the Terrell survey. His demurrer was, therefore, properly overruled, and for the same reason his motion for nonsuit was properly denied.

[2, 3] The next contention of the defendant is that the trial court was in error in admitting the main portion of the plaintiff's evidence offered for the purpose of explaining the alleged inaccuracies and ambiguities in the patent description and plat with respect to the location of the aforesaid southeasterly boundary of said rancho. It is undoubtedly true, and supported by abundant authority, that when the description of the granted tract of land embraced within the terms of a United States patent is, upon the face thereof, clear and unambiguous, such description constitutes the final word, and in such case evidence will not be admissible to show that the grantor intended to do other than that thus clearly set forth upon the face of said grant. Rose v. Davis, 11 Cal. 133; Moore v. Wilkinson, 13 Cal. 478; *Chapman v. Ed. 340; Southern Pacific R. Co. v. United States, 200 U. S. 354, 26 S. Ct. 298, 50 L. Ed. 512. But the foregoing authorities have no application to a case wherein it sufficiently appears upon the face of the description embraced in the terms of the patent itself or of the plat which accompanies and is made a part of the same that the same is in certain vital respects uncertain. In such a case the authorities hold that extrinsic evidence is admissible to explain away the uncertainties of the grant and to prove the real intent of the grantor in making the same, provided such evidence does not go to the extent of changing the clear intent of the grant as to the premises to be conveyed. This rule was well set forth in the case of Miller v. Grunsky, 141 Cal. 441, 452, 66 P. 858, 75 P. 48, 50, wherein this court said: "A patent is no doubt conclusive between the parties and their privies against any collateral attack, but before it concludes anything it must be construed and its meaning determined, and when it contains conflicting calls they are to be reconciled upon the same principles and by the same rules that govern the construction of other deeds of conveyance." We think this is such a case. We have hereinbefore pointed out some of the inaccuracies and defects in the Terrell survey which were carried into the description embraced in the grant itself. We might add, incidentally, that Deputy United States Surveyor Terrell made many surveys of California land grants, and that the reaction of the courts thereon has been that the Terrell surveys were quite generally found to be wrong. See Adair v. White, 85 Cal. 313, 24 P. 663. We might further suggest that the plat which accompanies the patent and which was not prepared by Terrell varies in an important particular from the calls of the field notes of Terrell; as, for example, the Terrell field notes establish the two points at each end of the southeasterly line of the rancho as being upon or very near the immediate coast line of the ocean. The natural and proper inference to be drawn therefrom would be that a meander line along the ocean shore would connect these two coast line corners. In the case of City of Los Angeles v. San Pedro, L. A. & S. L. R. Co., 182 Cal. 652, 654, 189 P. 449, 450, this court laid down the rule of law governing such a situation to be as follows: "It may be considered a canon in American jurisprudence, that where the calls in a conveyance of land are for two corners at, in, or on a stream or its bank, and there is an intermediate line extending from one such corner to the other, the stream is the boundary, unless there is something which excludes the operation of this rule by showing that the intention of the parties was otherwise." Yet upon turning to the plat which accompanies the patent we discover that the cartographer thereof has disregarded this rule and has drawn a straight line between these two shore-wise points, thus carrying the southeasterly boundary of the grant, throughout the larger portion thereof, many hundred feet inland from its natural shore line, thus making it to appear that the government in making this grant was not only disregarding the plain mandate of the District Court as to what was to constitute the southeastern and shore line boundary of the rancho, but was also thereby excluding from the terms of the grant a rugged and barren and apparently worthless (as land was then regarded) triangular strip of land without the slightest conceivable reason why it should have done so. There is another significant fact in this connection, which is that Surveyor Terrell, after completing his survey, figured the area of the rancho to be 30,593.85 acres, and that the patent accordingly calls for that area. The inclusion of the strip of land along the ocean side for which the plaintiff is herein contending gives an area to the rancho, according to the Stow survey, of 30,597.40 acres, or within about 4 acres of the Terrell calculation, while the exclusion of this strip of land, comprising 233.89 acres, would reduce the acreage of the rancho to that extent, and which in itself constitutes a material variation between the patent as the defendant contends it should be construed and the acreage stated in the patent as the area of the confirmed grant. In considering the foregoing obvious discrepancies appearing upon the face of the patent and its accompanying plat, the trial court concluded that it might properly be given access to the terms and maps of the original Mexican grant, to the decision of the United States District Court in directing a confirmation of said grant, to such other and later surveys of the rancho by surveyors seeking, somewhat vainly, to follow in the footsteps of Surveyor Terrell, and particularly to the testimony of C. W. Petit, who for many years had been the county surveyor of Ventura county, and was as such very familiar with the topography of the precise region involved in this litigation, and who not only went over the ground traversed by Terrell in making his survey, but undertook to prepare a map illustrative of the situation on the ground. The court, as we have seen, admitted these various forms of evidence, and also admitted much testimony offered by the defendant in controverting the same; and upon the conclusion and submission of the cause decided that the proper interpretation to be placed upon the patent of the Guadaluasca rancho as to its designation of the southeasterly boundary thereof was that such boundary consisted of a meander line along the ocean side, and as a consequence the lands involved in the defendant's appeal herein were at all times embraced within the area of the Guadaluasca rancho. Without undertaking to go over the numerous points in detail wherein the defendant and appellant assails said conclusion, and which are mainly covered by the points hereinabove considered, we are satisfied that these are without sufficient merit to justify a reversal of the case. We also do not deem the points made upon defendant's motion for a new trial worthy of detailed review.

[4] There is but one remaining point involved in the defendant's appeal, viz., that of the statute of limitations. It will be sufficient to state that whatever evidence was offered upon the subject of any adverse possession on the part of the defendant or his predecessors of the strip of land lying along the southeasterly boundary line of said rancho was quite conflicting, the claim of the plaintiff being that he and his predecessors in interest back to the original making of the Mexican grant had always been in the actual possession of said strip of land. The trial court found in the plaintiff's favor upon this issue and we shall not disturb its said finding thereon upon this appeal. Neither shall we disturb, for the same reason, the finding of the trial court upon the plea of an estoppel on the part of plaintiff to maintain this action.

In view of the foregoing considerations and of the plaintiff's concession that, in the event the judgment of the trial court is affirmed as to the defendant's appeal, it may also be affirmed upon the plaintiff's appeal, it follows that the said judgment must be, and the same is hereby, affirmed upon both appeals, each of the parties to pay his own costs.

MESSENKOP et al. v. DUFFIELD.L. A. 12416.*Supreme Court of California.*Dec. 30, 1930.*1. Appeal and error ↪985.

It is for trial, rather than appellate, courts to fix amount of appeal bonds and determine sufficiency of sureties.

2. Appeal and error ↪492.

Although appellate court may annul execution in violation of supersedeas, relief is not to be extended to cases where there was no effective stay when execution was had.

3. Appeal and error ↪484.

Effect of supersedeas is to hold matters in condition existing when stay became effective.

4. Contempt ↪22.

Plaintiff was not in contempt of Supreme Court's order, staying further proceedings upon judgment for possession of property, by leasing property after lawfully acquiring possession before order was made, though after application therefor.

Sureties upon defendant appellant's undertaking filed in court below having been rejected, and no other sureties having justified within time allowed by law, execution was no longer stayed by undertaking, and Supreme Court had not then issued order staying enforcement of judgment; hence plaintiff, having been placed in possession by sheriff before Supreme Court's order, he did not violate order by exercising his rights of property thereafter.

5. Appeal and error ↪484.

Stay pending appeal does not operate to restrain acts of litigants involving no further judicial proceedings.

6. Assistance, writ of ↪9.

Writ of possession issued upon judgment decreeing plaintiff entitled to possession of realty held proper though not ordered issued by court upon motion after judgment and proof of demand (Code Civ. Proc. § 682, subd. 5).

Defendant's contention that there was no valid execution because writ of possession was not ordered issued by court order upon motion after judgment and upon proof of demand, could not be upheld, since Code Civ. Proc. § 682, authorizes clerk to issue writs of execution upon judgments, and from subdivision 5 it appears procedure is applicable to writ issued upon judgment in present case, and since upon such judgment plaintiff was entitled to possession as matter of course.

7. Appeal and error ↪479(2).

Supreme Court, in exercising discretion, stayed execution upon unexecuted money judgment pending appeal, upon appellant's filing required undertaking in double amount of judgment (Code Civ. Proc. § 942).

Action by Louis H. Messenkop against Kathleen Duffield, and cross-action by defendant against plaintiff and another. Judgment in favor of plaintiff, and defendant and cross-complainant appeals. On petition in Supreme Court for writ of supersedeas, and on motion for order restoring petitioner to possession of real property involved in suit and adjudging respondent to be in contempt for violation of Supreme Court's order directing respondent to show cause why supersedeas should not be issued and staying execution pending hearing.

Stay of execution upon money judgment continued upon petitioner's filing with clerk a sufficient undertaking. Motion for order restoring petitioner to possession and adjudging respondents in contempt denied.

PER CURIAM.

Petition for writ of supersedeas. Upon an appeal from a judgment of the superior court of Los Angeles county decreeing plaintiff, Louis H. Messenkop, to be the owner and entitled to the possession of real property in the city of Los Angeles, and also awarding plaintiff a money judgment for $1,140, defendant and cross-complainant, Kathleen Duffield, filed an undertaking in the sum fixed by the court, to wit, $7,000, with five personal sureties. Said plaintiff, Messenkop, and cross-defendant, William L. Milne, excepted to the sufficiency of the sureties. The sureties were found insufficient and the undertaking rejected by a court commissioner on June 5, 1930. Defendant, on June 7, 1930, filed her petition for a writ of supersedeas in this court, praying that the execution of the judgment be stayed pending the hearing on the application for supersedeas, and that after hearing held a writ of supersedeas issue upon the filing of an undertaking in an amount fixed by this court. Petitioner alleged that said commissioner improperly rejected the sureties, and that the property owned by them was shown far to exceed the amount of the undertaking.

On June 16, 1930, this court entered its order directing respondents to show cause why a writ should not be issued and staying execution of the judgment pending hearing on said order. The proceeding is now before us after hearing held on September 15, 1930, pursuant to said order to show cause.

On September 5, petitioner filed notice in this court of a motion for an order restoring her to possession and adjudging respondents to be in contempt for violation of the court's order of June 16. It appears, from petitioner's affidavit accompanying the notice of motion and from the answer of respondents, that on June 9, after petitioner had filed her application for a writ of supersedeas, but before this court had taken any action thereon, the sheriff executed the portion of the judgment decreeing plaintiff entitled to possession of the property under a writ issued to him on June 6. Petitioner alleges that respondents and said sheriff had notice of the application made by her to this court for a writ of supersedeas.

[1-3] It is the function of trial courts, rather than of appellate tribunals, to fix the size of appeal bonds and to pass upon the sufficiency of sureties. But this court nevertheless has several times exercised its inherent power to restrain the enforcement of judgments upon the filing of a proper undertaking in this court where, by reason of the insufficiency of the undertaking filed in the court below, a statutory supersedeas had not been created. Williams v. Borgwardt, 115 Cal 617, 47 P. 594; Hill v. Finnigan, 54 Cal. 493; Nonpareil Manufacturing Co. v. McCartney, 143 Cal. 1, 76 P. 653; Segarini v. Bargagliotti, 193 Cal. 538, 226 P. 2. In these cases, however, the judgments had not been fully executed at the time the appellate court granted a supersedeas. In the case herein that portion of the judgment decreeing plaintiff to be the owner and entitled to the possession of the property was fully executed by the sheriff's placing him in possession on June 9 under a writ dated June 6. The writ was legally issued and served. The sureties upon the undertaking filed in the court below having been rejected, and no other sureties having justified within the time allowed by law, execution of the judgment was no longer stayed by said undertaking, and this court had not then issued an order staying enforcement of the judgment. Although the appellate courts have annulled executions had in violation of a supersedeas which was in full force and effect by ordering a restoration of possession of real property or restoring money seized (McAneny v. Superior Court, 150 Cal. 6, 87 P. 1020; Owen v. Pomona Land, etc., Co., 124 Cal. 331, 57 P. 71; Holcomb v. Juster, 39 Cal. App. 462, 179 P. 445), this relief is not to be extended to cases where at the time the execution was had there was no effective stay (Hoppe v. Hoppe, 99 Cal. 536, 34 P. 222; De Lemos v. Siddall, 143 Cal. 313, 76 P. 1115; In re McKean, 82 Cal. App. 580, 256 P. 226; Craig v. Stansbury, 37 Cal. App. 668, 174 P. 404; Smith v. Smith, 91 Cal. App. 743, 267 P. 709). The effect of a supersedeas is not to undo what already has been done, but to hold matters in the same condition as they existed at the time the stay became effective. Furthermore, it appears from petitioner's allegations that plaintiff and cross-defendant have not continued in possession of the property, but have leased it. It is not shown that the lessee had notice, actual or constructive, of any circumstances rendering it inequitable for his lessor to have acquired possession at a time when application had been made to this court for a supersedeas.

[4, 5] Plaintiff did not violate this court's order of June 16, staying further proceedings upon the judgment, by exercising his rights of property, as by leasing the property, after he had lawfully acquired possession before the order of this court was made. A stay pending appeal stays further proceedings in the court below upon the judgment or order appealed from. It does not operate to restrain acts of the litigants involving no further judicial proceedings. Hence plaintiff and cross-defendant are not in contempt.

[6] Petitioner's contention that there was no valid execution because the writ of possession was not ordered issued by court order upon motion after judgment, and upon proof of demand for possession and refusal, cannot be upheld. Section 682, Code of Civil Procedure, authorizes the clerk to issue writs of execution upon judgments, and from subdivision 5 of said section it appears that this procedure is applicable to a writ issued upon a judgment decreeing that plaintiff is entitled to possession of real property. Upon such a judgment a plaintiff is entitled to possession as a matter of course.

[7] As to that portion of the decree awarding plaintiff a money judgment for $1,140, a different situation exists. Said provision had not been executed at the time this court made its order staying further proceedings pending the decision upon the application for supersedeas, and the question is whether the court shall continue this stay until the determination of petitioner's appeal upon the filing of a bond in this court. Respondents do not controvert petitioner's allegations relating to the evidence offered before the commissioner as to the sufficiency of the sureties. They object only to this court granting relief as to that portion of the judgment directing delivery of possession of the real property to plaintiff, which has been executed.

In her application for a writ of supersedeas, petitioner alleges that the commissioner rejected the sureties upon her undertaking in the sum of $7,000 although two qualified appraisers testified that the aggregate of the property of four of the five sureties, after deducting incumbrances, was of a value exceeding $30,000, and that the two persons who appeared on behalf of plaintiff testified to no experience whatsoever as public appraisers. Petitioner further alleges that, but for the statement of the commissioner that he would accept the appraisal of one Herman F. Spitzel, one of the appraisers offered by petitioner, who, petitioner alleges, is generally recognized as the official appraiser of Los Angeles county, and but for the worry, harassment, and nerve exhaustion caused by the methods of cross-defendant Milne, she would have and could have secured other sureties within the time allowed. She claims that Milne and his wife went to her sureties to induce them to withdraw from the undertaking by threatening to purchase and foreclose mortgages upon their property.

Although petitioner alleges that the appraisers testified that the property of the sureties exceeded in value the sum of $30,000, nowhere does she make allegation to the effect that the appraisals showed a compliance with section 1057, Code of Civil Procedure, as interpreted in Mohn v. Superior Court, 53 Cal. App. 425, 200 P. 360. In that case there were six sureties. The affidavits of five showed that they were severally worth amounts less than that specified in the undertaking and that the aggregate value of their property was less than the amount of the undertaking. Although the sixth surety owned property sufficient to make the total for which the sureties qualified equal to twice the amount of the undertaking, the court held that it was not the equivalent of two sufficient sureties as required by the section, each of whom qualified in the full amount of the undertaking.

We are disposed, however, in the exercise of discretion, to continue the stay of execution upon that portion of the judgment awarding plaintiff $1,140, upon petitioner's filing with the clerk of this court, within twenty days, a good and sufficient undertaking in the sum of $2,280, which shall have been first approved by the presiding judge of the superior court of Los Angeles county upon at least five days' notice to respondents, the stay now in effect to continue pending the expiration of said twenty-day period. The amount of said undertaking is twice the amount of the judgment, as is the requirement for appeal bonds filed on money judgment in the superior court. Section 942, Code Civ. Proc. Petitioner's motion for an order restoring her to the possession of the real property in suit and adjudging respondents to be in contempt of court is denied.

It is so ordered.

PEOPLE ex rel. STEVENOT, Director of Natural Resources, v. ASSOCIATED OIL CO. et al.

L. A. 12311.

Supreme Court of California.

Dec. 3, 1930.

Rehearing Denied Dec. 29, 1930.

1. Constitutional law ⇨55.

Legislature, although it may regulate appeal and restrict granting of stay of execution, may not deprive reviewing court of constitutional power to grant writ of superseas (Const. art. 6, § 4).

2. Constitutional law ⇨81.

State's police power authorizes measures promoting general welfare.

3. Eminent domain ⇨2(1).

Use of private property, like property itself, is entitled to protection, and undue restriction on use constitutes "taking of property" for constitutional purposes.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Taking (In Eminent Domain)," see Words and Phrases.]

4. Constitutional law ⇨48.

If it is fairly debatable whether unlawful taking of property, or valid exercise of police power, is involved, statute will be upheld.

5. Constitutional law ⇨48.

That strong and preponderant opinion favors particular measure as immediately necessary to public welfare is important factor in establishing limits of police power.

6. Mines and minerals ⇨48.

At common law, owner of land owns everything above and beneath surface, as regards right to oil and gas.

7. Mines and minerals ⇨48.

Surface right to prospect for and recover oil and gas, apart from land in which they lie, is subject of barter, lease, sale, and assessment.

8. Mines and minerals ⇨48.

Oil and gas partake of nature of common property, title to which becomes absolute only when reduced to possession.

9. Mines and minerals ⇨92.

Because of peculiar nature of oil and gas, and their character as natural resources, public has interest in their preservation from waste and destruction.

10. Mines and minerals ⚡92.

Statute to protect petroleum and gas, prohibiting unreasonable waste, held constitutional, being valid exercise of police power (St. 1915, p. 1404, as amended by St. 1929, p. 923).

Oil and Gas Conservation Act (St. 1915, p. 1404) § 21a, as added by St. 1917, p. 1598, § 18, declares that people have primary and supreme interest in deposits of oil and gas, and section 8b, as added by St. 1929, p. 927, § 9, prohibits unreasonable waste of natural gas from oil or gas lands. Section 14b, as added by St. 1929, p. 930, § 14, relates to method of enforcement.

11. Evidence ⚡5(1), 9, 20(1).

Courts may take judicial notice of condition and development of petroleum industry, and of matters of science and common knowledge.

12. Mines and minerals ⚡92.

"Unreasonable waste of natural gas" within Conservation Act held to result where gas is allowed to come to surface without utilizing its lifting power to produce greatest proportional quantity of oil (St. 1915, p. 1404, § 8d, as added by St. 1929, p. 928, § 11).

Oil and Gas Conservation Act (St. 1915, p. 1404) § 8d, as added by St. 1929, p. 928, § 11, states that production of gas in quantities exceeding reasonable proportion to amount of oil, and in excess of industrial needs, shall be deemed "unreasonable waste."

13. Statutes ⚡47.

Statute prohibiting "unreasonable waste" of natural gas held not objectionable as being too vague or uncertain in meaning (St. 1915, p. 1404, § 8b, as added by St. 1929, p. 927, § 9).

It appeared that, due to many varying conditions peculiar to each well, which would affect determination of reasonable proportion of gas to amount of oil produced, it would be impossible for Legislature to frame measure based on ratios or percentages which would operate without discrimination; and that, in each case, reasonable proportion of gas to oil produced could be ascertained to fair degree of certainty.

14. Constitutional law ⚡55.

State has power generally to prescribe admissible evidence and its effect, and may provide that proof of particular fact shall be prima facie evidence of another fact.

15. Constitutional law ⚡55.

Statute, making escape of natural gas prima facie evidence of unreasonable waste, held not objectionable, although imposing burden of justifying waste on person responsible (St. 1915, p. 1404, § 8b, as added by St. 1929, p. 927, § 9).

16. Mines and minerals ⚡92.

Statute prohibiting unreasonable waste of natural gas held not objectionable as intended to curtail oil production and regulate price, notwithstanding possibility of such result (St. 1915, p. 1404, as amended by St. 1929, p. 923).

Statute involved recognized primary function of natural gas in production of oil, and attempted to safeguard complete utilization of gas, without unnecessary waste, whether in producing oil, or in providing light and heat for industrial and domestic use.

17. Mines and minerals ⚡92.

That statute prohibiting, under police power, unnecessary waste of natural gas, may curtail oil production, cannot alone invalidate act (St. 1915, p. 1404, as amended by St. 1929, p. 923).

18. Mines and minerals ⚡92.

Operation of oil well, causing unreasonable waste of gas, injurious to adjoining owners and public, held properly enjoined under statute, until improvement in efficiency (St. 1915, p. 1404, as amended by St. 1929, p. 923).

19. Mines and minerals ⚡92.

Under statute prohibiting unreasonable waste, injunction limiting gas production, allowing for unavoidable waste, and allotting proportional amounts based on estimated potential oil production, held proper (St. 1915, p. 1404, as amended by St. 1929, p. 923).

It appeared that there was no serious dispute on the facts; that experts, whose testimony was received by trial court, were not in accord as to proper methods of enforcing co-operation in limiting waste of gas; and that court reserved right to modify injunction as might be found necessary.

SHENK, J.

This is a petition for a writ of supersedeas to stay the effect of a preliminary injunction pending an appeal therefrom by the petitioners herein.

The action was commenced in the county of Los Angeles on September 11, 1929, and in the name of the people on the relation of Fred G. Stevenot, Director of Natural Resources of the State of California, against some forty-three defendants who are oil producers owning oil wells and leases in the Santa Fé oil field in said county. The purpose of the action is to restrain the alleged unreasonable waste of natural gas from the wells of the defendants. In response to the order to show cause the defendants appeared and after an extended hearing the superior court granted a temporary injunction, the terms of which were complied with except by the defendants Twin Bell Syndicate, Second Twin Bell Syndicate, and Star Petroleum Company, who have taken an appeal from the order granting the temporary injunction and who are the petitioners herein.

On the hearing it appeared from the allegations of the complaint and the affidavits and other evidence, both oral and documentary, in support thereof, that during the year 1928, 77,000,000,000 cubic feet of natural gas were wasted into the air from the subsurface oil and gas zones in the state of California through the operation of oil wells; that because of the increase in the production of oil since that time a proportional increase in the wastage of natural gas is taking place, and that in the Santa Fé Springs oil field alone there was at the time of the commencement of the action a wastage of natural gas to the extent of approximately 500,000,000 cubic feet of gas per day. This wastage was alleged to be unreasonable and unlawful under the terms of the so-called Oil and Gas Conservation Act (St. 1915, p. 1404, as amended by St. 1929, p. 923). In granting the preliminary injunction the court found that no sufficient cause had been shown why a preliminary injunction should not be issued as prayed for in the complaint; that the equities of all parties might be fairly conserved by a preliminary injunction which would limit the waste of gas by restricting the production thereof to a quantity reasonably in excess of the present outlets for the beneficial use above ground; that the total gas escapeage from outlets for all uses, with a reasonable tolerance to take care of fluctuating demands and the necessary waste, would be fixed at 285,000,000 cubic feet of gas per day in said field, and the estimated potential production of oil taken at 237,576 barrels per day distributed among lessees and other operating property units as shown by a schedule set out in the order. It was then provided in the order that the defendants be enjoined until the further order of the court: "1. From blowing, releasing, or permitting any natural gas to escape into the air from any well or wells in the Santa Fé Springs oil field before the removal of the gasoline from such natural gas. 2. From operating any well producing natural gas in the Santa Fé Springs oil field except while exercising a high degree of care in the selection and adjustment of appliances and in the use thereof for the purpose of keeping each producing well in its 'optimum gas-oil ratio'—the term 'optimum gas-oil ratio' being defined as the smallest number of cubic feet of gas which can be produced with each barrel of oil from the same well at the same time. 3. From producing more net formation gas on the average day of each seven (7) day period from any lease or other property unit than is set forth in the 'Allowed Gas Production' column following." The name of each operator and of each well operated is then set out in detail and opposite thereto the estimated potential in barrels of oil per day and the allowed gas production in daily average as to each well is stated. The term "Gas-oil ratio," as used in the order, is declared to be "the proportion which the total number of cubic feet of formation gas bears to the total number of barrels of net oil produced from the same well at the same time, exclusive of the quantity of gas inserted in the well for the purpose of lifting the oil." The preliminary injunction contains other provisions not necessary to be noticed, except that the court retained jurisdiction to vacate or modify the same on five days' notice. The order was dated March 19, 1930, and to be effective two days later. On March 28, 1930, the court modified its order as to allowable gas production applicable to certain wells and certain defendants operating the same, including the petitioners herein; and in such a way that instead of a gas allowance of 1,200 cubic feet to a potential barrel of oil established by the original order, the petitioners were allowed approximately 2,000 cubic feet of gas to a potential barrel of oil. The oil cut in the field was 50 per cent. of the potential, consequently the petitioners were allowed a potential ratio of 4,000 cubic feet of gas to a barrel of oil. From the order granting the temporary injunction the petitioners herein have taken an appeal.

The authority for the action in which the temporary injunction was issued is found in section 14b of the Oil and Gas Conservation Act (St. 1915, p. 1404, as amended, St. 1929, p. 923.) The purpose of the act is stated in its amended title, which recites in part: "An act to protect the natural resources of petroleum and gas from waste and destruction." Section 8b of the amended act reads: "The unreasonable waste of natural gas by the act, omission, sufferance or insistence of the lessor, lessee or operator of any land containing oil or gas, or both, whether before or after the removal of gasoline from such natural gas, is hereby declared to be opposed to the public interest and is hereby prohibited and declared to be unlawful. The blowing, release or escape of natural gas into the air shall be prima facie evidence of unreasonable waste." Section 14b of the act provides in part: "Whenever it appears to the director of the department of natural resources that the owners, lessors, lessees or operators of any well or wells producing oil and gas or oil or gas are causing or permitting an unreasonable waste of gas, he may institute, or have proceedings instituted, in the name of the people of the State of California, to enjoin such unreasonable waste of gas. * * * Such proceedings shall be instituted in the superior court for the county in which the well or wells from which the unreasonable waste of gas is occurring or any thereof are situated. The owners, lessors, lessees or operators causing or permitting an unreasonable waste of gas in the same oil or gas field, although their properties and interests may be separately owned and their unreasonable waste separate and distinct, may be made parties to said action. In such suits no restraining order shall be issued ex parte, but otherwise the procedure shall be governed by the provisions of chapter three, title seven, part two of the Code of Civil Procedure of the State of California and no temporary or permanent injunction issued in such proceedings shall be refused or dissolved or stayed pending appeal upon the giving of any bond or undertaking, or otherwise."

[1] It is conceded that this court has the power, by virtue of section 4 of article 6 of the Constitution and in aid of its appellate jurisdiction, to stay pending appeal the operation of a prohibitory injunction, and it is not seriously contended that the provision at the end of said section 14b that "no temporary or permanent injunction issued in such proceedings shall be refused or dissolved or stayed pending appeal upon the giving of any bond or undertaking, or otherwise," would have the effect of limiting the discretion of this court in the exercise of its constitutional power. Although the Legislature may prescribe certain regulations in matters of appeal and restrict the granting of a stay of execution, it may not enact legislation which will deprive the reviewing court of its power under the Constitution to grant a writ of supersedeas in a proper case. United States of America v. Berg, 202 Cal. 10, 13, 258 P. 942; Ohaver v. Fenech, 206 Cal. 118, 273 P. 555. Whether the application herein presents a proper case for the issuance of the writ is one of the principal points to be considered.

Three main contentions are advanced for the issuance of the writ: First, that the Conservation Act is unconstitutional because the enforcement of its provisions amounts to a taking of property without due process of law and if the taking be for a public purpose, that such taking is the taking of private property without compensation; secondly, that the provision of the act declaring unlawful the "unreasonable waste" of natural gas is so vague, uncertain and indefinite as to be devoid of any guide or standard as to what shall constitute reasonable or unreasonable waste of natural gas; and, thirdly, that the order is arbitrary and violative of the due process and equal rights guaranties of the state and federal Constitutions and that the showing made on this application presents a proper case for the issuance of the writ in order to preserve the appellants' rights pending appeal.

[2-5] The foregoing contentions will be considered in the order stated. The first relates to the constitutionality of the act as an alleged police measure. This question is argued extensively by counsel for the parties and more at length by numerous amici curiae supporting the position of the petitioners, who contend that the pertinent portions of the act do not constitute a valid exercise of the police power of the state. It is argued that the state has no sufficient interest in oil and gas resources within its boundaries to justify its attempt to control what the owner of the land may do with his own beyond such regulations as will prevent injury or are necessary to protect the life, health and safety of its citizens. But there is no longer any doubt that this general rule has been extended so as to include measures which relate to the general welfare. In the case of Chicago, B. & Q. Railway v. Illinois, 200 U. S. 561, at page 592, 26 S. Ct. 341, 349, 50 L. Ed. 596, 4 Ann. Cas.

1175, the Supreme Court stated: "We hold that the police power of a state embraces regulations designed to promote the public convenience or the general prosperity, as well as regulations designed to promote the public health, the public morals, or the public safety." (Citing cases.) See, also, Bacon v. Walker, 204 U. S. 311, 27 S. Ct. 289, 51 L. Ed. 499; Camfield v. U. S., 167 U. S. 519, 17 S. Ct. 864, 42 L. Ed. 260; Noble State Bank v. Haskell, 219 U. S. 104, 31 S. Ct. 186, 55 L. Ed. 112, 32 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1062, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 487; Barbier v. Connolly, 113 U. S. 27, 5 S. Ct. 357, 28 L. Ed. 923; Village of Euclid v. Ambler Realty Co., 272 U. S. 365, 47 S. Ct. 114, 71 L. Ed. 303, 54 A. L. R. 1016; Zahn v. Board of Public Works, 274 U. S. 325, 47 S. Ct. 594, 71 L. Ed. 1074; Block v. Hirsh, 256 U. S. 135, 41 S. Ct. 458, 65 L. Ed. 865, 16 A. L. R. 165. The same view has heretofore been expressed by this court in Miller v. Board of Public Works, 195 Cal. 477, 234 P. 381, 38 A. L. R. 1479. The difficulty usually arises in determining whether the particular right sought to be regulated or prohibited is subject to such regulation or prohibition and whether in the particular case the legislature has gone too far with the resultant unlawful taking. It may not be disputed that the use of private property is a right as much entitled to protection as the property itself, and an undue restriction on the use thereof is as much a taking "for constitutional purposes as appropriating or destroying it." Pennsylvania Coal Co. v. Mahon, 260 U. S. 393, 43 S. Ct. 158, 160, 67 L. Ed. 322, 28 A. L. R. 1321; Missouri Pac. Ry. v. Nebraska, 164 U. S. 403, 17 S. Ct. 130, 41 L. Ed. 489; Pumpelly v. Green Bay Canal Co., 13 Wall. (80 U. S.) 166, 20 L. Ed. 557. If the question between the taking of private property and a proper exercise of the police power is fairly debatable, the statute will be upheld. Gorieb v. Fox, 274 U. S. 603, 47 S. Ct. 675, 71 L. Ed. 1228, 53 A. L. R. 1210; Zahn v. Board of Public Works, supra; Levy Leasing Co., Inc. v. Siegel, 258 U. S. 242, 42 S. Ct. 289, 66 L. Ed. 595. Also where a strong and preponderant opinion prevails in the state that a particular measure is greatly and immediately necessary to the public welfare, that factor has an important influence in establishing the limitations of the police power in a particular case (Muller v. Oregon, 208 U. S. 412, 28 S. Ct. 324, 52 L. Ed. 551, 13 Ann. Cas. 957; Noble State Bank v. Haskell, supra); although such a view is always subject to the qualification stated by Mr. Justice Holmes in Pennsylvania Coal Co. v. Mahon, supra: "The general rule at least is that while property may be regulated to a certain extent, if regulation goes too far it will be recognized as a taking."

There are many cases and great uniformity of decision to the effect that the public has a sufficient interest in the preservation of oil and gas to justify legislation to prevent waste thereof, among which are Ohio Oil Co. v. Indiana, 177 U. S. 190, 20 S. Ct. 576, 44 L. Ed. 729; Walls v. Midland Carbon Co., 254 U. S. 300, 41 S. Ct. 118, 65 L. Ed. 276; Lindsley v. Natural Carbonic Gas Co., 220 U. S. 61, 31 S. Ct. 337, 55 L. Ed. 369, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 160; Hague v. Wheeler, 157 Pa. 324, 27 A. 714, 22 L. R. A. 141, 37 Am. St. Rep. 736; Quinton Relief Oil & Gas Co. v. Corporation Commissioner, 101 Okl. 164, 224 P. 156; State v. Ohio Oil Co., 150 Ind. 21, 49 N. E. 809, 47 L. R. A. 627; Commonwealth v. Trent, 117 Ky. 34, 77 S. W. 390, 4 Ann. Cas. 209; Louisiana Gas & Fuel Co. v. White Brothers, 157 La. 728, 103 So. 23. See, also, note in 24 A. L. R., beginning at page 307.

[6-9] The argument is advanced by the petitioners and by their supporting amici curiae that the public interest cannot be invoked where the common law as to the nature of the property right in the oil and gas prevails. The rule at common law is that the owner of the land owns everything above and beneath the surface, and it is contended that oil and gas beneath the surface are recognized as part of the realty and belong to the owner of the land and are a part of it so long as they are on it or in it or subject to his control. In this they are supported by the case of Gas Products Co. v. Rankin, 63 Mont. 372, 207 P. 993, 24 A. L. R. 294, where the same rule was applied to gas and oil beneath the surface as to minerals in place, such as coal and ore. But Montana appears to be the one state, among the many gas and oil producing states, which has established such a rule of property with reference to gas and oil. By uniformity of decision elsewhere the common-law rule has been modified in order to adapt it to the peculiar nature of gas and oil. The rule universally adopted, except in Montana, is expressed in Brown v. Spilman, 155 U. S. 665, 15 S. Ct. 245, 247, 39 L. Ed. 304, as follows: "Petroleum gas and oil are substances of a peculiar character, and decisions in ordinary cases of mining, for coal and other minerals which have a fixed situs, cannot be applied to contracts concerning them without some qualifications. They belong to the owner of the land, and are part of it, so long as they are on it or in it or subject to his control; but when they escape and go into other land, or come under another's control, the title of the former owner is gone. If an adjoining owner drills his own land, and taps a deposit of oil or gas, extending under his neighbor's field, so that it comes into his well, it becomes his property." (Citing cases.) In this state the character of oil beneath the surface, as distinguished from that of the precious metals, fixed in the veins which hold them, was well described in Acme Oil & Mining Co. v. Williams, 140 Cal. 681, at page 684, 74 P. 296, 297, wherein it was said: "Oil, on the contrary, is of a fluctuating, uncertain, fugitive nature, lies at unknown depths, and the quantity, extent, and trend of its flow are uncertain. It requires but a small surface area, in what is known as an oil district, upon which to commence operations for its discovery. But when a well is developed the oil may be tributary to it for a long distance through the strata which holds it. This flow is not inexhaustible, no certain control over it can be exercised, and its actual possession can only be obtained, as against others in the same field, engaged in the same enterprise, by diligent and continuous pumping. It is anybody's property who can acquire the surface right to bore for it, and when the flow is penetrated, he who operates his well most diligently obtains the greatest benefit, and this advantage is increased in proportion as his neighbor similarly situated neglects his opportunity." The same rule would apply to natural gas. It is common knowledge that the surface right to prospect for and recover oil and gas, apart from the land in which they are situated, is the subject of barter, lease, or sale. When so acquired the right is subject to assessment apart from the land. Graciosa Oil Co. v. Santa Barbara County, 155 Cal. 140, 99 P. 483, 20 L. R. A. (N. S.) 211. The generally accepted view, therefore, is that the property right of the owner or lessee of land in and to the gas and oil beneath the surface is not an absolute one. Such substances, because of their peculiarity in the natural state, partake more of the nature of common property, title to which becomes absolute when they are captured and reduced to possession. Because of their peculiar nature the public has a definite interest in their preservation from waste and destruction. This is true because of their character as natural resources and also because the public interest has attached by virtue of positive statutory law or by court judgment independent of statute. In seven states of the Union legislation making unlawful the unreasonable waste of natural gas has been upheld: Indiana: State v. Indiana v. Ohio Oil & Gas Co., 150 Ind. 21, 49 N. E. 809, 47 L. R. A. 627; Ohio Oil Co. v. Indiana, 177 U. S. 190, 20 S. Ct. 576, 44 L. Ed. 729. Kentucky: Commonwealth v. Trent, 117 Ky. 34, 77 S. W. 390, 4 Ann. Cas. 209. Wyoming: Walls v. Midland Carbon Co., 254 U. S. 300, 41 S. Ct. 118, 65 L. Ed. 276. Oklahoma: Quinton Relief O. & G. Co. v. Corp. Comm., 101 Okl. 164, 224 P. 156. Louisiana: State v. Carson Carbon Co., 162 La. 781, 111 So. 162. Texas: Oxford Oil Co. v. Atlantic Oil P. Co. (C. C. A.) 22 F.(2d) 597, certiorari denied United States Supreme Court, 277 U. S. 585, 48 S. Ct. 433, 72 L. Ed. 1000; Railroad Commission of Texas v.

Bass (Tex. Civ. App.) 10 S.W.(2d) 586; Magnolia Petroleum Co. v. Stroud (Tex. Civ. App.) 3 S.W.(2d) 462. Kansas: State v. Lebow, 128 Kan. 715, 280 P. 773, 775; Marrs v. City of Oxford (C. C. A.) 32 F.(2d) 134, 67 A. L. R. 1336, rehearing denied, Circuit Court of Appeals, May 17, 1929, certiorari denied, United States Supreme Court, October 21, 1929, 280 U. S. 573, 50 S. Ct. 29, 74 L. Ed. 625. Independently of statute the waste of gas resulting merely in a depletion of the supply in a common reservoir has been enjoined. Manufacturers Gas & Oil Co. v. Ind. Natural Gas Co., 155 Ind. 461, 57 N. E. 912, 50 L. R. A. 768, and Id., 156 Ind. 679, 59 N. E. 169, 60 N. E. 1080; Louisville Gas Co. v. Ky. Heating Co., 117 Ky. 71, 77 S. W. 368, 70 L. R. A. 558, 111 Am. St. Rep. 225, 4 Ann. Cas. 355; and Id., 132 Ky. 435, 111 S. W. 374; Louisiana Gas & Fuel Co. v. White Brothers, 157 La. 728, 103 So. 23. The leading case on the power of the state to prevent the waste of natural gas is Ohio Oil Co. v. Indiana, 177 U. S. 190, 20 S. Ct. 576, 44 L. Ed. 729. There a statute of Indiana was sustained which made it unlawful to permit the escape of natural gas from any well for more than two days after oil or gas had been struck, without storing the same. There is considerable discussion in that case concerning the protection necessary to be accorded the correlative rights of adjoining landowners in the same field, and the petitioners herein seek to confine the holding of the Supreme Court in that case to the protection, under the exercise of the police power, of those correlative rights. But the holding in that case cannot be so limited. The decision in that case defines the so-called correlative right not necessarily as a right to a fixed distributive or proportional share of the oil and gas underlying the surface, which no other owner of soil overlying the same reservoir may take and use beneficially, but as a coequal right to take whatever of the oil and gas can be captured, so long as waste, as defined by the statute, is not committed.

In the Ohio Oil Company Case the Supreme Court, at page 204 of 177 U. S., 20 S. Ct. 576, 582, quoted with approval from Hague v. Wheeler, 157 Pa. 324, 27 A. 714, 22 L. R. A. 141, 37 Am. St. Rep. 736, as follows: "Now, it is doubtless true that the public has a sufficient interest in the preservation of oil and gas from waste to justify legislation upon this subject. Something has been done in this direction already by the acts regulating the plugging of abandoned wells. * * * In the disposition he may make of it (private property) he is subject to two limitations. He must not disregard his obligations to the public. He must not disregard his neighbor's rights. If he uses his product in such a manner as to violate any rule of public policy, or any positive provision of the written law, he brings himself within the reach of the courts. If the use he makes of his own, or its waste, is injurious to the property or the health of others, such use or waste may be restrained, or damages recovered therefor; but, subject to these limitations, his power as an owner is absolute until the legislature shall, in the interest of the public, as consumers, restrict and regulate it by statute." Again the Supreme Court, in the same case, at page 207 of 177 U. S., 20 S. Ct. 576, 583, referring to Townsend v. State, 147 Ind. 624, 47 N. E. 19, 37 L. R. A. 294, 62 Am. St. Rep. 477, said: "In a full opinion reviewing the nature of the ownership in oil and natural gas, the power of the state to regulate and control their use and waste in the interest of all those within the gas field and of the public at large was elaborately considered. Reviewing its own previous adjudications, which we have cited, and those of the supreme court of the state of Pennsylvania, to which we have also referred, it was decided that the owners of the surface of the land within the gas field, whilst they had the exclusive right on their land to sink wells for the purpose of extracting the oil and gas, had no right of property therein until by the actual drawing of the oil and gas to the surface of the earth they had reduced these substances to physical possession. It was further held that in consequence of the nature of the deposits, of their transmissibility, of their interdependence, of the rights of all and of the public at large, the state could lawfully exercise the power to regulate the right of the surface owners among themselves to seek to obtain possession, and to prevent the waste of the products in which all the surface owners within the area wherein the gas and oil were deposited, as well as the public, had an interest, because in the preservation of these substances the well-being and prosperity of the entire community was largely involved. And it was upon the opinion announced in that case that the court rested its decree in the case now under review."

Section 21a of our statute provides, among other things, for the levy of charges necessary to supervise and protect deposits of oil and gas within the state, "in which deposits the people of the State of California are hereby declared to have a primary and supreme interest." St. 1917, p. 1598. This declaration is in accord with the prevailing opinion, both legislative and judicial, in the many jurisdictions where the exploitation and waste of such natural resources as gas and oil have attracted and received intelligent public consideration.

[10] Whatever refinements may be suggested as to the definition of the nature of the property right in gas and oil beneath the surface and uncaptured, we are entirely satisfied that the waste of these natural resources may be regulated and the unreasonable waste thereof may be prohibited in the exercise of the police power of the state, and that the statute in question is not subject to the objections first advanced by the petitioners.

It is next contended that the term "unreasonable waste" has not been defined by the statute; that it is so uncertain in its meaning and so devoid of a rule or standard of conduct that an ordinary person cannot determine in advance what he may and may not do; and that it is therefore void within the doctrine of such cases as International Harvester Co. v. Kentucky, 234 U. S. 216, 221, 34 S. Ct. 853, 58 L. Ed. 1284; United States v. L. Cohen Grocery Co., 255 U. S. 81, 41 S. Ct. 298, 65 L. Ed. 516, 14 A. L. R. 1045; Connally v. General Construction Co., 269 U. S. 385, 391, 46 S. Ct. 126, 70 L. Ed. 322; Cline v. Frink Dairy Co., 274 U. S. 445, 47 S. Ct. 681, 71 L. Ed. 1146; Hewitt v. State Board of Medical Examiners, 148 Cal. 590, 84 P. 39, 3 L. R. A. (N. S.) 896, 113 Am. St. Rep. 315.

[11] Courts are entitled to take judicial notice of the condition and development of the petroleum industry. Gilbreath v. States Oil Corp. (C. C. A.) 4 F.(2d) 232. The present status of the importance of petroleum and gas in industry is stated in the recent case of Boone v. Kingsbury, 206 Cal. 148, 181, 273 P. 797. Courts may also take judicial notice of all matters of science and common knowledge. Reynolds v. McMan Oil & Gas Co. (Tex. Com. App.) 11 S.W.(2d) 778, 784. Facts relating to the general nature of so-called oil "sands" which also contain natural gas, such as are found in this state, and the physical and economic laws governing oil and gas production, the present general economic status and the necessity and pressing demand for conservation to prevent waste in the gas and oil producing industry, may be found in the following scientific reports referred to by counsel, viz.: Report 111 of the Federal Oil Conservation Board to the President of the United States, February 25, 1929; Bulletin 194, Department of the Interior, Petroleum Technology 61, published as a report of the Bureau of Mines in 1921 by Carl H. Beal and J. O. Lewis; Bulletin 232, Department of the Interior, Manual for Oil and Gas Operations, prepared by T. E. Swigart and C. E. Beecher, 1923; Technical Paper 322, Department of the Interior, Experiments in the Use of Back Pressures on Oil Wells, T. E. Swigart and C. R. Bopp, 1924; Department of Commerce, Mineral Resources of the United States, 1927, Part II, pages 129-137, Natural Gas, by G. R. Hopkins and H. Backus; Department of Commerce, United States Bureau of Mines, 1929, H. C. Miller, Function of Natural Gas in the Production of Oil; Reports of American Bar Association, 1927, vol. 52, page 577 et seq.

[12] For present purposes it need only be noted that oil in this state is found under layers of rock in a sand or sandstone formation termed a lentille or "lentic," under pressure caused by the presence of natural gas within the formation. The layers of rock thus form a gas-tight dome or cover for the oil reserve. The oil adheres in the interstices between the sand particles. The natural gas may be in a free state at the top of the dome, but is also in solution with the oil, thus increasing the fluidity of the oil and the ease with which the oil is lifted with the gas in solution when the pressure on the gas is released by drilling into the oil "sand." It is estimated that only from 10 to 25 per cent. of the total amount of oil deposited in a reservoir is ultimately recovered, depending on the natural characteristics of the reservoir and the methods employed in utilizing the lifting power of the gas. The importance of gas in the oil-producing industry has, therefore, become a question of great concern to the industry itself and to government, to the end that its function may be fully utilized without waste. It fairly appears on this application that, depending on its location in the oil reservoir, the extent of the oil "sand," the degree of pressure within the formation, the amount of oil in the "sand," the amount of gas in solution with the oil, the porosity of the "sand," and other considerations, each oil and gas well has a best mean gas and oil ratio in the utilization of the lifting power of the gas and the production of the greatest quantity of oil in proportion to the amount of gas so utilized, and which may be computed as to each individual well to a reasonable degree of certainty and be regulated accordingly. Gas, therefore, which has been allowed to come to the surface without its lifting power having been utilized to produce the greatest quantity of oil in proportion, may be said to amount to an unreasonable waste of natural gas.

That the Legislature intended to prohibit such a waste of natural gas, and so defined the term "unreasonable waste," is quite apparent from a consideration of the provisions of a portion of section 8d of the act. Section 8d relates to the procedure upon complaint of undue waste filed with the director of natural resources, and the portion thereof immediately quoted is offered to us by petitioners as the only statement in the act of any standard of "unreasonable waste," viz.: "If it shall appear that gas is being produced from any oil well or wells in quantities exceeding a reasonable proportion to the amount of oil produced from the same well or wells, even though it is shown that such excess gas is being used in the generation of light, heat, power or other industrial purpose and that there is sufficient other gas available for such uses from other wells in the same or other fields in which the gas produced is not in excess of the amount which bears a reasonable proportion to the amount of oil produced from such other wells and that there are adequate gas-pipe-line connections between such other wells and the place of utilization of such gas the state oil and gas supervisor shall hold that such excess production of gas is unreasonable waste thereof if such holding will not cause an unreasonable waste of gas in any other field." It would seem, therefore, that the Legislature has plainly adopted the standard so expressed, viz.: that gas may not be produced, under existing conditions where the production thereof so greatly exceeds the market demand therefor, in quantities exceeding a reasonable proportion to the amount of oil produced, as the standard to be applied and beyond which the production is prohibited as being an unreasonable waste of natural gas.

[13] The standard so adopted by the Legislature is, we think, not objectionable as being too vague or uncertain of application. The best mean ratio, or the amount of gas which bears a reasonable proportion to the amount of oil produced, may vary for each reservoir or deposit of oil, depending on the natural characteristics above mentioned, and may, and probably does, vary for each well drilled into the same reservoir, depending on the location of the well and other factors. Therefore, because of the many and varying conditions peculiar to each reservoir and to each well, which will bear upon a determination of what is a reasonable proportion of gas to the amount of oil produced, it may be said that it would be impossible for the Legislature to frame a measure based on ratios or percentages or definite proportions which would operate without discrimination, and that what is a reasonable proportion of gas to the amount of oil produced from each well or reservoir is a matter which may be ascertained to a fair degree of certainty in each individual case. The adoption, therefore, of such a measure seems to us to be within the scope of cases upholding other legislative enactments which have employed the so-called "rule of reason." Citation of authority is not necessary to support the statement that the standard of reason has been applied in many cases where certainty is less capable of measurement than in the present case, for instance, in statutes prohibiting unreasonable restraints of trade, the common-law rule of a reasonable use of water by riparian owners, the rule of law regulating the duty of care, etc. Instances "where a man's fate depends on his estimating rightly, that is, as the jury subsequently estimates it, some matter of degree," are common. See Nash v. United States, 229 U. S. 373, 377, 33 S. Ct. 780, 57 L. Ed. 1232.

The so-called "price" and similar cases relied upon by the petitioners as establishing the contrary doctrine, and above cited, involve the uncertainty of man's judgment as to what is an unjust, or unreasonable price, or a current rate, or fair market value, in fluctuating or uncertain markets, so as to make the risk of conduct so great as to be without the pale of certainty required for the terms of a statute. The case of Hewitt v. State Board of Medical Examiners, supra, is also clearly distinguishable, in that the prohibition against gross and improbable statements in medical advertising involved therein does not define any measure upon which two persons may agree within any degree of certainty. The argument is made that the same conclusion must be reached in respect to the standard of reasonableness required by the present statute, for the reason that the standards applying the "rule of reason" in cases said to be analogous have been gleaned from or formulated by previous legislation or by many prior decisions or are within the common experience of mankind. But this argument is not persuasive when it may be said that scientific knowledge and oil and gas operating experience have achieved a similar degree of certainty in the field in which the present standard will apply. Whether the evidence sustains the ratio applied by the court in this case under such standard is a question on the merits of the appeal and is not pertinent to a determination of the merits of this application.

[14,15] Objection is made to the provision of section 8b of the act that "the blowing, release or escape of natural gas into the air shall be prima facie evidence of unreasonable waste," as inconsistent with other provisions of the act which it is claimed authorize some waste of gas in the production of oil. The state has the power generally "to prescribe the evidence which shall be received and the effect which shall be given to it in her own courts, and may exert this power by providing that proof of a particular fact, or of several taken collectively, shall be prima facie evidence of another fact." Lindsley v. Natural Carbonic Gas Co., 220 U. S. 61, 31 S. Ct. 337, 342, 55 L. Ed. 369, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 160. In prescribing that any waste shall be prima facie evidence of unreasonable waste, the state has cast upon the party found to be wasting gas the burden of justifying the same. A statute which casts the burden of proof upon the defendant in a criminal action upon the proof of certain facts for whose existence he is responsible has been upheld. People v. Osaki (Cal. Sup.) 286 P. 1025. As applied to a civil action, a statute imposing the burden of proof is freed from the objections incident to the rules inherent in a criminal prosecution and cannot be avoided for any reason suggested by the petitioner or otherwise apparent.

[16,17] It is contended that the real purpose of the statute is to curtail the production of oil so as to regulate and stabilize the market price thereof. We cannot agree with this contention. Obviously the enactment is an effort on the part of the Legislature to conserve for present and future needs great natural resources in which the people of the state are interested. It may be that the enforcement of the statute throughout the gas and oil producing sections of the state may have an effect upon the market price of oil. For this reason the subject-matter of the act is a delicate one for legislative treatment and judicial cognizance. But the fact that the field of economic law to some extent may thus be invaded may not justify the avoidance of the statute. As we view the terms of the act, the primary function of gas in the production of oil is recognized, and its complete utilization in that respect, without unnecessary waste, is attempted to be safeguarded. The additional function of the gas in providing light and heat for manufacturing and domestic purposes is also recognized, and the effort is made to compel the fullest utilization as to both functions. The act, without doubt, was a response to a growing recognition that the continuing and increasing waste of the propulsive energy of gas underground and of its full energy above ground was unreasonable and should be inquired into and regulated, to the end that the public convenience and general prosperity of the commonwealth be promoted. Such legislation should not be stricken down because there may be an incidental and unavoidable interference in the economic field. The result complained of—the lessening of the daily production of oil—if it follow from the operation of the statute, is a matter of concern for the Legislature and cannot of itself make void a police measure which is otherwise a constitutional exercise of the legislative power. "At least," as was stated in Noble State Bank v. Haskell, 219 U. S. at page 111, 31 S. Ct. 186, 188, 55 L. Ed. 112, 32 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1062, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 487, "if we have a case within the reasonable exercise of the police power as above explained, no more need be said."

Some argument also is advanced that the statute is unconstitutional because it embraces more than one subject and that the title does not express the subjects embraced in the act; that the statute impairs the obligations of contracts; and that it deprives petitioners of the equal protection of the laws and grants special privileges and immunities. We have considered these arguments and, except such as are related to the matters herein elsewhere discussed, we deem it unnecessary to give them any further notice.

[18] The final question to be considered is whether the particular preliminary injunction ordered by the trial court violates any constitutional guaranties. The terms of the order in establishing the gas-oil ratio have been hereinbefore specifically noted. It is contended that the enforcement of the terms of the order will require the shutting down of well No. 4 of the petitioner, Star Petroleum Company. Conceding this to be so, it is the contention of the respondents that the operator is in no position equitably to insist that that well, which, is called a "waster," may operate to the manifest detriment of the other operators in the field and to the public in general. There are twelve oil and gas zones in the Santa Fé Springs oil field, varying in depth from 3,450 feet to 8,000 feet. The area of land within the oil field is divided into not less than 1,145 parcels at the surface. These parcels are owned of record by more than 110 individuals and corporations. Many of the parcels are rectangles less than 75 feet by 100 feet. The Star Well No. 4 is on one of the smaller parcels, being located within a radius of 137 feet from the exterior boundaries of the parcel on which it is located. This well has withdrawn the equivalent of all the recoverable oil within said exterior boundaries and has withdrawn gas and large quantities of oil from the lands of its neighbors. Under the rule in this state such withdrawal is recognized as lawful and without trespass. Without more, however, the foregoing facts with reference to this well may be said to be insufficient upon which to base an injunctive order. But when it further appears that in the operation of this well the natural gas-oil ratio is injurious to the rights of all of the adjoining landowners and to the public in general by reason of the unreasonable waste of gas in the operation thereof, we have no hesitancy in saying that it should be shut down until more efficient methods are employed to conserve the wasted product. The statute held valid in the case of Ohio Oil Co. v. Indiana, supra, permitted no waste of gas whatsoever for a longer period than two days after gas or oil had been struck. The margin between no waste at all and a reasonable waste in recognition of the propulsive function of the gas is largely one of fact. In the ascertainment of the fact the Legislature has vested in the superior court full power and duty in the premises. It is contended by the petitioner that the statute, as applied by the court, has made it practically impossible to profitably extract the oil. This same contention was advanced with seemingly more justification, but was rejected, in the case of Ohio Oil Co. v. Indiana, supra.

[19] As we understand the order, the natural gas outlets in the entire field were taken as 285,000,000 cubic feet of gas per day, determined by the beneficial uses to which such gas could be put, and which contained a certain tolerance for necessary and unavoidable waste and the fluctuations in the demands for the same. The court then, for safety, increased the amount by some 10,- 000,000 cubic feet and fixed the daily "Allowed Gas Production" for the entire field at such increased amount. It then prorated this "Allowed Gas Production" among the separate operating properties of the defendants and in connection therewith estimated the "Potential Oil Production" of the field at 237,576 barrels of oil per day. In other words, the court limited the total quantity of gas which might be produced from the field and allotted proportional amounts thereof to the separate parcels of land of the defendants based on the estimated potential oil production of each parcel. As to the facts, there is no serious dispute. The experts whose testimony was received by the trial court were not in accord as to the proper methods to apply in enforcing cooperation in response to the statute. Reading the act as a whole, it cannot be said that the method of its enforcement adopted by the court was unlawful or improper. We find no reason at this time to interfere with the action taken. The court reserved to itself the right to modify the preliminary injunction as occasion may require, and this, we assume, the court will do if and when, by test and experience, other proper methods may be discovered and applied to the correction of the evil of unreasonable waste of this natural resource. Other points need not be discussed.

The writ of supersedeas is denied, and the order to show cause is discharged.

Action by Marion Wilson against E. Droegé. Judgement for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

WARMER, Justice pro tem.

This case was tried without a jury. The court made its findings and entered a judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals from the judgment so entered. The plaintiff charges negligence of an employee or agent of the defendant in the operation of a motor truck. The answer denies the allegations of the complaint and sets up contributory negligence as a defense. The court finds as follows: "That, heretofore and within a period of one year next before the filing of the complaint in this action, to-wit: On or about the 23rd day of January, A. D. 1929, the plaintiff herein was, in the county of San Bernardino, state of California, run into and struck by an automobile truck belonging to the defendant, E. Droegé, then and there in charge of and being driven and operated by one of defendant's employees, agents or servants in and about defendant's business and in the regular course of the employment of said employee, agent or servant of the said defendant, and with the knowledge and consent of the said defendant and under his direction; that, at the time the plaintiff was so run into and struck by said automobile truck of the defendant, as aforesaid, the said employee, agent or servant of the said defendant was guilty of negligence in the driving and operation of said automobile truck and, but for which said negligence, said plaintiff would not have been so run into and struck by said automobile truck of the defendant; that, as a direct and proximate result of the negligence and carelessness on the part of the said employee, agent or servant of the said defendant, and the running into and striking of the plaintiff, the plaintiff was knocked down and against and across the bumper of her automobile and to the pavement and, by reason thereof, plaintiff was bruised and injured in and about her abdomen, her leg broken at the knee, her spine and back wrenched, and her vertebra dislocated; that, by reason thereof, plaintiff was greatly and permanently injured; and suffered great physical and mental pain and anguish."

The facts out of which the cause of action arose, briefly stated, are as follows: On January 23, 1929, plaintiff was driving from the city of Riverside to her home on South Cedar avenue, town of Bloomington, and as she proceeded along said avenue in a northerly direction she discovered that something was wrong with her automobile so that it became more difficult to control or steer. As she passed the intersection of said Cedar avenue and Santa Ana street she drove her car off the paved portion of the highway to a position where the two right wheels of her automobile were about one foot and a half off the pavement, got out of the said car, went around in front thereof and stooped down and found that a piece of wire was lodged between the brake lining and the brake drum on the left front wheel. The wheels of said automobile were what is known as disk wheels and she removed the wire so lodged as aforesaid by pulling the same back and forth. Just as she released it and while she was standing on the paved portion of the highway and immediately in front of her automobile and slightly farther out on the paved portion of the highway than her machine she heard the blast of a horn and raised up and just as she was getting up a truck struck her on the shoulder, causing her to spin around and throwing her against the bumper on the front of her automobile, thence on her knees to the ground. She observed that the driver of the truck wore sun glasses, that the cab of the truck was painted red and the tank on the truck was painted a turquoise blue, that there was the name "Marine" on the rear end of tank on the truck, and that said tank was oval in shape. She observed the state license plate number under the rear parking light on said truck, that the number was either 239922 or 239920, that she was certain of each of the numbers on the license plate excepting the last one and she was not certain whether said number was "0" or "2," but was certain that it was either "0" or "2," that the registration records show that the defendant was the owner of three trucks, two of them being similar in type, one bearing the state license No. 239920 and the other 239922 and the third of a somewhat different and lighter type bearing the license number 239921. The truck did not stop at the time plaintiff was struck, and there is nothing in the evidence to show that the driver of said truck knew of any collision. The truck was equipped with a shelf along the side of the tank. On said shelf there was either one or two cans. Another witness testified that a short distance from the place where he saw the automobile of plaintiff standing partially off the pavement, near the intersection of Cedar avenue and Santa Ana street, he had observed a truck painted similarly to the one described by the plaintiff, proceeding in a northerly direction on said Cedar avenue. The defendant had a loading depot at West Riverside and distributed oil products in and around Bloomington, Colton, and San Bernardino. Said trucks were brought to San Bernardino for storage each night. The defendant herein knew nothing concerning the claim of plaintiffs until several months after said January 23d. The defendant, in the course of his business, kept a daily report of his trucks, and said reports show that the drivers of said trucks had no business of defendant in or about the vicinity of Bloomington or on Cedar avenue on said 23d day of January, or within two days thereof.

[1, 2] Appellant urges that there is no evidence to sustain the findings that said truck was being operated at the time of the collision by an employee of the defendant, or, in other words, that the doctrine of respondeat superior does not here obtain. Before such doctrine obtains two facts are necessary of proof, first, the existence of the relationship of master and servant, and, second, that the servant was acting within the general scope of his employment. Kish v. California State Automobile Association, 190 Cal. 246, 212 P. 27. When the pleadings put in issue the fact as to whether or not the truck was being operated by an employee, the burden of proof is on the plaintiff to establish such fact at the time of the alleged negligence. King v. Emerson (Cal. App.) 288 P. 1099.

[3, 4] Assuming that one of the trucks belonging to the appellant was the truck involved in the accident, which one of the two trucks, the one bearing license number 239922 or 239920, cannot be determined unless the fact that the person who was driving the truck at the time of the accident wore sun glasses, coupled with the fact that occasionally the driver of truck bearing state license number 239922 wore sun glasses, can be said to determine that fact, or, in other words, constitute substantial evidence to support the finding. The wearing of sun glasses by one driving a truck is very common. In fact sun glasses are occasionally worn by almost every one who has occasion to be riding in or operating an automobile. If, instead of sun glasses, the evidence had been that the driver wore a white shirt or khaki breeches or a cap or brown shoes or puttees and that the defendant, appellant, had a driver who occasionally wore a white shirt or khaki trousers or brown shoes or a cap or puttees, can it be said that there is anything about the above facts so distinctive or unusual as to support the conclusion that because the driver was dressed in such a manner one could reasonably say that the driver who occasionally so dressed was the driver of the truck involved in the accident? We think not. Such a conclusion would be a conjecture and would not meet the requirement that evidence must be substantial to support a finding, nor can the mere fact that the driver of a truck which is involved in an accident wore sun glasses so mark him that it can be said that such fact, coupled with the fact that the driver of truck number 239922 occasionally wore sun glasses, would constitute sufficient or substantial evidence to support the finding that such driver was the employee of the owner of the truck. It merely points the way to the possibility that such a fact might be true. Without such a fact established, the evidence is insufficient to support the finding that the truck was being driven at the time of the accident by an employee of the defendant. Without sufficient proof of the fact that the driver of the truck was an employee of the defendant, no inference can arise that the truck was being operated in the business of the defendant. The evidence being insufficient to support the finding that the truck that was involved in the accident was being driven by an employee of the defendant, it is insufficient to support the finding that the truck was being operated by an employee of the defendant in and about the defendant's business in the regular course of his employment.

[5] Appellant further urges that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the finding that the truck was being operated by an agent of the defendant within the scope of his authority. This contention must be sustained unless the fact that the truck was owned by the defendant and was being operated upon a public highway raises an inference that the operator so operating the truck is an agent of the owner and acting within the scope of his authority. Cal. Jur. Permanent Supp. 1928, p. 284. In other words, they contend, the ownership of the truck being proved and its operation upon a public highway appearing, such facts raise first an inference of agency, and, second, an inference that said agent was acting within the scope of his authority. The evidence shows that the truck involved in the accident was a truck owned by the defendant and was being operated by some one, which gives rise to an inference that the owner permitted the operator to use said motor vehicle. To hold otherwise would be to presume that it was reasonably likely that the driver was then and there guilty of criminal conduct or to infer that the operator was actually engaged in the commission of a crime. Therefore under such circumstances the law creates an inference that the owner permitted the driver to use said motor vehicle. Such being true, does the inference that the owner permitted the driver to use said motor vehicle, thus drawn, also give rise to an inference that the operator was an agent of the owner? It seems to us that to hold that an inference of agency thus arises by implication of law would be to give rise to a broader inference than is created to sustain a finding under the doctrine of respondeat superior, and we perceive of no reason either in law or logic so to do. Further that such an inference would be useless and of no avail to the plaintiff unless such inference under such circumstances gave rise to another and independent inference that the agent was acting within the scope of his authority. To so hold would permit of an inference founded upon another inference or deduction instead of upon proven facts. To do so would be merely conjecture or speculation. Hence the inference that arises from the ownership of a motor vehicle and its operation upon a public highway is one of permissive use rather than one looking to agency, and, in the absence of other proof that the person operating said motor vehicle was an agent of the owner, it would not support a finding to that effect. To hold otherwise would be to say to the plaintiff "prove an act of negligence and the ownership of a machine and its operation upon a public highway and you have established a prima facie case," which would in effect be the creating of an inference by deduction from an inference. Therefore we are of the opinion that no inference arises from the proof or admission of the ownership of the vehicle alone and its operation upon a public highway, that the machine was being operated by an agent of the owner within the scope of his authority. The evidence is therefore insufficient to support the finding that the truck was being operated by an agent of the defendant and in the defendant's business.

Nothing herein expressed is in conflict with the line of cases as McWhirter v. Fuller, 35 Cal. App. 288, 170 P. 417, holding that, where a wife is driving a car owned by her husband with the express knowledge and consent of the husband, an inference arises that she was using the car as the agent of the husband, or that line of cases holding that, when the ownership of the motor vehicle is admitted or proved, and it is admitted or proved that the operator thereof was an agent or servant of the owner, the inference arises that said agent or servant was operating said motor vehicle within the scope of his authority. King v. Emerson, supra. In each and all of said cases the identity of the operator of the automobile was established to sustain the finding that the operator was the agent or servant of the owner, while in the instant case the identity of the driver of the truck at the time of the accident is undisclosed. No inference of agency is created by the facts that the defendant owned the offending vehicle, and that he permitted the driver to use it. Aubel v. Sosso, 72 Cal. App. 57, 62, 236 P. 319. Where, however, it is admitted or established that the vehicle which collided with the plaintiff was owned by the defendant and that the driver was his employee, an inference arises that the driver was acting within the scope of his authority or employment. Wagnitz v. Scharetz, 89 Cal. App. 511, 265 P. 318; Cal. Jur. Permanent Supp. 1928, p. 284 supra, and cases there cited.

[6] It is next urged that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law because she parked her machine partially on the highway in contravention of statute. Inasmuch as this cause, from what we have heretofore said, must be reversed, we deem it sufficient to say that the statute prescribes where a person shall stop his machine and when it is permissible to stop the same upon the highway. The evidence is not very clear as to what the condition of the shoulder along the highway was at the date of the accident. It does appear that at the place where the plaintiff actually stopped her machine she could not have driven the same completely off of the highway but it does not appear that it was impossible for her to have proceeded in safety a little farther to a place where it might have been possible for her to have driven her machine entirely off of the highway. Neither does it appear that it would have been impossible for her to have driven her machine completely off of the highway had she proceeded farther.

"No person shall park or leave standing any vehicle whether attended or unattended upon the paved or improved or main traveled portion of any public highway, outside of a business or residence district when it is practicable to park or leave such vehicle standing off of the paved or improved or main traveled portion of such highway; provided, in no event shall any person park or leave standing any vehicle whether attended or unattended upon any public highway unless a clear and unobstructed width of not less than fifteen feet upon the main traveled portion of said highway opposite such standing vehicle shall be left for the free passage of other vehicles thereon. * * *

"The provisions of this section shall not apply to the driver of any vehicle which is disabled while on the paved or improved or main traveled portion of a public highway in such manner and to such extent that it is impossible to avoid stopping and temporarily leaving such vehicle in such position."

It appears from the quoted portions of said act that no person shall leave any vehicle standing on a public highway, unless there is a clearance of 15 feet on said public highway, unless the condition of the machine is such as to make it impossible to proceed. It appears from the evidence that at the place where the plaintiff drove partially off of the highway it was impossible for her to get farther off of the highway, but it may have been that, in the condition in which her machine then was, it would have been possible for her to proceed in safety a short distance and come to a place where she could have driven her machine entirely off of the highway. If such was the case, the statute imposed upon her the duty of so doing unless the condition of her machine was such as to make it imperative for her to stop at the narrow place in the road. It will be observed that the cause of action herein arose prior to the adoption of section 1714 $\frac{1}{4}$, Civil Code.

For the foregoing reasons the judgment is reversed.

NOURSE, P. J.

Plaintiff sued for the rescission of a contract to purchase a sublease on an oil and gasoline service station together with all equipment and stock in trade. The cause was tried without a jury, and the court gave judgment for plaintiff, from which the defendants appeal on a bill of exceptions.

The defendants had been operating the station under lease and during the year 1924 had averaged a sale of 1242 gallons of gasoline a day. The Sierra Refining Company was the lessee of the real property and held a contract with defendants for the sale to them at wholesale of all the gasoline dispensed upon the premises. Under the agreement with the refining company the defendants were obligated to pay a monthly rental of $150 plus one cent a gallon per month for each gallon of gasoline sold on the premises.

In the latter part of January, 1925, negotiations were had between plaintiff and defendants for the sale of the station and plaintiff insisted that this lease be changed to a flat rental. Thereupon a new lease was executed by the refining company to the defendants for an extended period at a monthly rental of $400, all of which was done with the written consent and agreement of plaintiff. On February 2, 1925, plaintiff and defendants executed a written contract for the sale of the sublease and all the equipment and accessories and the plaintiff soon thereafter entered into possession and continued to operate the station until July 8, 1925.

On the 4th of June, 1925, plaintiff gave written notice of his election to rescind this contract, giving as his sole ground the falsity of defendants' representations that the station had enjoyed an average sale of over one thousand gallons of gas per day. When confronted with proof that the average daily sales for the entire year preceding the transfer had been 1242 gallons, plaintiff, on June 29, 1925, gave a new notice of rescission, specifying as his ground that the representations as to daily sales went to the month of January, 1925, alone, and that the "net profit" for that month had been $690.

The appellants have assigned numerous errors, but as we are satisfied that the judgment must be reversed, we deem it necessary to consider but three of the grounds assigned.

[1-3] 1. The failure of proof of the falsity of the representations relied on: On the matter of the net profit for the month of January no evidence at all was received, and hence the finding that this representation was false was not supported by the evidence. On the matter of the daily sales, the only competent evidence covered the period from January 1st to the 9th and the period from the 21st to the 28th inclusive. There was no competent evidence covering the remaining days of the month—the guess of the employee who was working part time being nothing more than a conjecture. Respondent testified that early in February one of the appellants had given respondent's counsel sales slips containing the complete data of daily sales and also the record of sales by the wholesaler, that these had been handed to him by his counsel, but he had failed to examine them and had lost them. Inasmuch as the burden of proof was on respondent to prove the falsity of the representations, his failure to produce this evidence must be taken against him under the presumption found in section 1963, subdivision 5, Code of Civil Procedure.

[4, 5] On this point the case is a simple one. The respondent first based his claim of fraud on a general representation as to daily sales. When convinced that the proof of these sales for the entire previous year showed they were far greater than represented, he changed his charge to the period of January, 1925. The utter improbability of a purchaser of a going business limiting his investigations to the sales of one month out of the twelve when the information covering the entire previous year was available from the records and when he knew that the information as to the January sales was incomplete merely emphasizes the necessity of satisfactory proof of the charges relied on. These representations were claimed to have been made before the end of January when complete records of sales for that month were not at hand and when it was impossible to correctly state the net profits for the month. It has frequently been said that fraud is not to be presumed, and, when fraud is the basis of the action, it must be proved by competent evidence. Here the finding as to the average daily sales for the month of January is based upon conjectures and not upon evidence. This is patent when we take into consideration that the business of a gasoline service station in the month of January is largely dependent upon weather conditions, so much so that sales for the month cannot be fairly averaged on the basis of actual sales during a portion of the month without taking the weather conditions into account.

[6] 2. The notice of rescission was defective because the respondent did not offer to restore the consideration he had received. Included in the sale were automobile tires, casings, tubes, and other accessories of an approximate value of $1,100. These respondent sold while in possession. He retained the proceeds, but made no offer to restore to appellants. There was also included in the sale 1,100 gallons of gasoline and a large quantity of oils. Sales of these materials were also made, but respondent did not offer to make restoration.

[7-9] 3. The importance of this item is emphasized by the third point to be considered, which is the undisputed laches of the respondent. Though the trial court found that respondent did not discover the falsity of the representations until June, 1925, all the evidence is directly to the contrary. Bearing in mind that these representations were not what daily sales might be anticipated, but what sales were actually made in January, 1925, we turn to the evidence and find that in February of that year respondent was informed by one of the appellants' employees that the January sales did not exceed seven hundred gallons daily and that respondent admitted while on the stand that he learned in February that the January sales had been misrepresented and that this "put me on inquiry." He further testified that he knew he could obtain the data of January sales from the wholesaler, that records showing these sales had been in his possession and in the hands of his counsel in February, but that he had not examined them. The undisputed evidence is that in February, 1925, respondent knew that the January sales had been exceptionally low, that the business did not pick up in February as he had expected, but that he continued in the possession of the premises in the hope that with the end of the "gasoline war" and with better weather conditions the business would improve. This is, therefore, a typical case of a purchaser who, knowing the facts which would entitle him to rescind, elects to stand upon the contract for the purpose of seeking profit to himself, and then, failing to gain profit, changes his mind and seeks to avoid the contract. The cases are uniform that the purchaser must make his election when he has knowledge of the facts involved and that he cannot gamble with his contract. Ferguson v. Edgar, 178 Cal. 17, 19, 171 P. 1061; Bancroft v. Woodward, 183 Cal. 99, 111, 190 P. 445; Greene v. Locke-Paddon Co., 36 Cal. App. 372, 374, 172 P. 168; Schneider v. Henley, 61 Cal. It is equally well settled that where a party has knowledge of facts which would reasonably put him on inquiry, and such inquiry, if pursued, would have led to a discovery of the fraud, he will be charged with having discovered it as of the time he should have discovered it. Lady Washington C. Co. v. Wood, 113 Cal. 482, 488, 489, 45 P. 809; Bancroft v. Woodward, 183 Cal. 99, 108, 190 P. 445.

1. Evidence ⇐429.

Where vital issue required decision on true nature of contract, all evidence pertinent thereto was admissible.

2. Usury ⇐115.

Agreement legal on its face is open to evidence dehors written contract to show it was in fact usurious.

3. Usury ⇐117.

Evidence held not to warrant implied finding that difference between cash sales price for automobile and time sales price was interest and did not authorize recovery of triple interest for usury.

Automobile was sold under conditional sales contract providing for payments in installments, deferred payments to bear interest from maturity at highest legal rate. Buyer alleged total of cash payment and installments exceeded agreed purchase price of car, and that such excess was interest exceeding legal rate of interest allowed, and was usurious. Seller claimed that amount added to purchase price was mark-up or added charge for expenses and risk incident to financing as time sales price.

4. Usury ⇐32.

Where time price exceeds cash price, and difference is more than legal rate of interest, transaction is not thereby usurious.

CRAIG, J.

A judgment having been rendered in favor of the plaintiff and against the purchaser of a conditional-sale contract for triple the amount of alleged interest on deferred payments, the latter appealed therefrom.

The respondent entered into a contract in writing for the purchase of an automobile from a dealer who subsequently sold said contract to the appellant herein for an amount equal to the retail price of the car, if sold for cash. By the terms of their agreement the original parties recited payment upon its execution of a specified sum, and divided the remainder into eighteen equal installments which they agreed respondent should pay each consecutive month thereafter, "all deferred payments to bear interest from date of maturity at the highest legal rate, but not exceeding 12 per cent per annum." The plaintiff alleged that the total of the cash payment and installments exceeded the agreed purchase price of the car, that such excess was interest thereon, and that it amounted to more than the legal rate allowed for "the loan or forbearance of money, goods or things in action," and was usurious. It is conceded that the amount in controversy was added to the unpaid balance of the purchase price after deduction of the cash payment, but with the knowledge and consent of the purchaser, prior to the execution of the contract. It is contended by appellant that it consisted of a "mark-up," or added charge for expenses and risk incident to financing the contract and extending the time for payment of the balance of the purchase price. It was testified on behalf of the vendor: "There was a cash sales price and a time sales price. Ten months' time would be one price; sixteen months another, eighteen months another, twelve months another. * * * It would be the price we would have to charge in order to have the Fay Securities Company take the contract on a time sales price." The plaintiff testified: "I asked him what mark-up meant, and he said that covered interest and handling charges. * * * I asked him what the interest ran, and he said it ran 10 per cent. and he figured it up for me." The trial court found that the increase so added exceeded the legal rate of interest, and that appellant "took and received money in a greater sum for the forbearance of money, goods or things in action than the rate of twelve dollars upon each one hundred dollars for one year and that said contract was so written and worded with the intent to evade the usury law of the state of California."

[1, 2] Since the vital issue before the trial court required a decision as to the true nature of the contract, all evidence pertinent thereto was material and clearly admissible. In such a case the agreement of the parties is open to evidence dehors the written contract to show that, although legal on its face, it was in fact an illegal agreement. France v. Munro, 138 Iowa, 1, 115 N. W. 577, 19 L. R. A. (N. S.) 391; Brown v. Johnson, 43 Utah, 1, 134 P. 590, 46 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1157, Ann. Cas. 1916C, 321; Cissna L. Co. v. Gawley, 87 Wash. 438,

[3, 4] We think the evidence did not warrant the implied finding that the difference between the cash sales price and the time sales price was stipulated to be interest. There was no evidence to indicate what portion of this sum was interest except the statement of the plaintiff that the vendor had said it would run 10 per cent. It has repeatedly been held that, where the time sales price exceeds the cash sales price and the difference amounts to more than the legal rate of interest it does not follow that the transaction is usurious, but that other considerations than interest are properly involved, such as the risk incident to financing the contract, expenses connected therewith, etc. 27 R. PANN v. FAY FRUIT CO.

Civ. 6369.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 2, California.

Dec. 30, 1930.

1. Sales ⇨391(8), 441(2).

Evidence held to support findings that seller warranted oranges, which were unmerchantable, justifying buyer in recovering price.

Court found that seller knew oranges in question were bought for specific purpose of resale in eastern markets; that buyer relied on warranties that oranges were of good color and merchantable; that oranges were not of good color, and were worthless to buyer; and that buyer, on discovering falsity of warranties, immediately tendered oranges to seller, who refused to accept them.

2. Sales ⇨418(3).

Where seller of unmerchantable oranges knew that buyer contemplated resale in eastern market, their value in such market, rather than value in place of original sale, held controlling factor in damages.

It appeared that seller knew buyer was relying on representations regarding color and quality of oranges in question, and that buyer would probably make no inspection at place of shipment.

3. Evidence ⇨325.

In buyer's action to recover price of green and unmarketable oranges, color chart, not aiding in determining marketability, held properly excluded.

It appeared that chart in question was prepared by bureau of standardization of state department of agriculture, rather than by witness, who was deputy county horticultural commissioner. Purpose of chart was said to be to illustrate color scheme, showing oranges 25 per cent. colored, and oranges 70 per cent. colored, but it did not appear how chart would have assisted court in determining whether oranges were of good color when shipped, or whether they were marketable and merchantable.

4. Sales ⇨398.

In allowing buyer to recover price of unmarketable oranges, court should have deducted amount which buyer recouped on resale.

IRA F. THOMPSON, J.

This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff in the sum of \$1,562.30, and representing the full purchase price of a carload of oranges purchased of defendant at Santa Ana, Cal. The material facts are as follows: On December 4, 1922, a representative of appellant called respondent on the telephone and asked him if he had any orders; quoted respondent two cars of navels, one for shipment that day and one on the following day. Respondent inquired concerning the quality and particularly concerning the color. The fruit was represented to be of "good color and good full pack." Respondent replied that he would wire the car out and confirm the following day, which he did, receiving in return bill of lading and manifest. Respondent also informed appellant's representative that he was relying upon his representations entirely as to the quality. Respondent paid appellant the sum of \$1,562.30 for the oranges. On the arrival of the car at Youngstown, Ohio, it was found, according to the testimony of at least one witness, that the "color was dead green and couldn't even be identified as oranges"; that "they were worthless," although there was a "good market" and "heavy demand" for California oranges. According to the chief food inspector of Youngstown he found the "shipment of oranges to be too green to be marketable" and estimated their condition as follows: "yellow—8%; 10–25% green—30%; light green 27%; $\frac{1}{4}$ to $\frac{1}{2}$ green 20%; more than $\frac{1}{2}$ green 15%." When this condition of the fruit was reported to respondent he advised appellant and demanded that it receive the oranges back, which demand it refused, whereupon, he diverted the car to New York and sold these oranges, which had been robbed of sufficient California sunshine, at public auction, realizing therefrom the sum of \$41.80 in excess of the freight, or a total of \$752.40. It was alleged in the complaint and not denied that respondent was engaged in the business of buying fruit in California and shipping it to purchasers in the east, all of which was known to appellant. Further, the respondent testified that "very likely" he told appellant's representative where the car was going and the latter testified that he thought respondent told him "he was purchasing for an eastern purchaser." It should be observed, of course, that we have recited the testimony supporting the respondent's cause of action and not the testimony adduced by appellant in conflict therewith.

[1] It is now insisted by appellant that certain portions of the findings of the court are unsupported by the testimony. It is obvious from our review that the following contested portions thereof do find sufficient support:

(a) "That plaintiff purchased said fruit for the purpose of selling same in the eastern holiday markets, and defendant at the time it sold same to plaintiff knew that plaintiff was purchasing said fruit for that specific purpose."

(b) "That plaintiff purchased said fruit from defendant upon the statements, representations, assurances and warranties of defendant that said oranges and all thereof were of good color, marketable, sound and merchantable."

(c) "That said oranges were not of good color but were too green to be merchantable or marketable and were so green as to be worthless to plaintiff; that defendant made said representations for the purpose of deceiving plaintiff and inducing plaintiff to purchase said oranges well knowing that said oranges were not marketable and were not merchantable."

(d) "That when plaintiff learned of the falsity of said statements, representations, assurances and warranties, he immediately tendered the whole of said car to defendant and notified defendant that he would not accept same; that defendant refused to accept such tender and refused to have anything more to do with said carload of oranges."

[2] There is another part of a finding which is attacked, to wit: "That said oranges * * * were of no value whatsoever at Santa Ana, California, or Los Angeles, California, or at any eastern market by reason of the fact that said oranges were not of good color and were not as represented by defendant." There was no testimony that the oranges were not of any value at Santa Ana, or Los Angeles, and it is to be observed that the court simply declared that they were of no value, deducing his conclusion from their condition, which was described by witnesses, the effect of which testimony we have already set down. Aside from this fact, however, arises the question of whether their value here or their value in the eastern market is the governing factor. The appellant contends that the value at Santa Ana must be considered as determining the situation, but in this we do not agree. In the recent case of Brandenstein v. Jackling, 99 Cal. App. 438, 278 P. 880, 885, it is said: "Moreover, it was proper to measure the damages as of the time and place of arrival of the rice at Cuba under the authority of W. R. Grace & Co. v. Levy, 30 Cal. App. 231, 156 P. 626. Appellants knew the rice was to be shipped to Cuba by the terms of the contract and the contract likewise apprised them that no inspection as to quality No. 1 would be made by respondents at point of shipment. See, also, 22 Cal. Jur. 1022, and cases cited, and Porter v. Gestri, 77 Cal. App. 578, 247 P. 247." The authorities cited in the quoted matter fully support the rule and effectually dispose of appellant's argument.

Two other excerpts from the findings to which objection is made relate solely to the question of demand and damages. Further comment is unnecessary.

[3] While it is said that a finding responsive to an affirmative defense upon which issue no testimony was presented is not supported by the evidence, the point actually presented is that the court committed error in refusing appellant's offer of a chart (apparently colored) prepared by the bureau of standardization of the state department of agriculture, and not by the witness, who was a deputy horticultural commissioner of the county of Los Angeles. The purpose of the offer in the words of counsel was "as showing the color scheme, or document as prepared by this department showing oranges which are approximately 25% colored and oranges approximately 70% colored, said chart being made under the provisions of the Standardization Act of 1921." We are unable to conceive how the chart would have assisted the court in arriving at the conclusion that the oranges were 70 per cent. colored at the time of the packing or that they were marketable and merchantable. There was no error in its rejection.

[4] The court did commit one error. It failed to deduct from the purchase price the sum of $41.80 recouped by respondent. That sum should be deducted from the amount of the judgment.

The judgment is modified by reducing it to the sum of $1,520.50, and, as so modified, it is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; J. R. Hughes, Judge.

Application by F. V. Daniels for writ of habeas corpus. From an order granting the writ, the People appeal.

Reversed and petitioner remanded to custody of warden of state prison at Folsom for completion of term of imprisonment.

See, also, 288 P. 1109.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Dep. Atty. Gen., for the People.

Lawrence J. Skirving, of Sacramento, for respondent.

Mr. Justice R. L. THOMPSON delivered the opinion of the court.

This is an appeal from an order granting a writ of habeas corpus. The petitioner was released on bond pending the appeal.

The petitioner was convicted of a felony and sentenced to imprisonment in the state prison at San Quentin. He was received at that prison June 27, 1925. The prison board subsequently fixed his term of imprisonment at five years. He was released on parole. October 23, 1928, during his parole, he was convicted of a misdemeanor and sentenced to imprisonment in the county jail at Los Angeles for the term of six months. He served his term in the county jail, which sentence terminated May 13, 1929. The petitioner was thereupon returned to the state prison at Folsom to complete his sentence upon the charge of the felony. May 18, 1929, the prison board found him guilty of a violation of his parole. Pursuant to section 1588 of the Penal Code, as it then existed, the prison board revoked all of the petitioner's past and future time credits. Without the benefit of time credits the petitioner's term of imprisonment in the state prison expired June 28, 1930, provided the intervening period of six months during which he was imprisoned in the Los Angeles county jail is credited upon his state prison term. Upon a petition for a writ of habeas corpus, which was presented to the superior court of Sacramento county on September 13, 1930, the writ was granted and the warden of Folsom state prison was directed to discharge the prisoner. From this order the people of the state of California appealed. The petitioner was admitted to bail pending the appeal.

It is contended by the petitioner that his term of imprisonment in the county jail at Los Angeles, under the provisions of section 669 of the Penal Code, ran concurrently with his state prison term, and that he was entitled to credit on the last-mentioned term for the intervening time which he served in the county jail.

[1] This precise question has been determined adversely to the petitioner. In re Forbes (Cal. App.) 292 P. 142. A writ of habeas corpus in behalf of Forbes, based upon the same grounds presented in the case last cited, was denied by the Supreme Court October 23, 1930. Upon that authority it follows that when a parole has been revoked and time credits have been canceled, the term of imprisonment served by a prisoner in a county jail as punishment for a misdemeanor committed during the period of parole may not be credited on a pending state prison commitment.

[2-5] In the present case the petitioner served six months' time in the county jail as punishment for a misdemeanor which was committed during his parole. This offense constituted a violation of the parole which was therefore revoked November 17, 1928. While a prisoner remains without the prison walls after his parole has been revoked, in effect, he may be deemed to be an escaped prisoner or a fugitive from justice, during which period he may not claim the benefit of the running of his sentence. When a parole is suspended or revoked, it is the duty of a prisoner to forthwith present himself to the warden of the state prison for the completion of his sentence. The fact that he has incurred another penalty for a subsequent offense may not inure to his benefit so as to shorten his term of imprisonment for the former felony. Ordinarily another court may not legally pronounce a judgment of commitment so as to interfere with the due execution of a previous judgment of imprisonment. Section 669 of the Penal Code, upon which the petitioner in this case relies, is not applicable. Under the provisions of that statute, if it has any application at all to a misdemeanor case, it was the duty of the justice of the peace who pronounced judgment in the misdemeanor case to have sentenced the petitioner so that his imprisonment would commence "at the termination of the first term of imprisonment" for the felony charge. If the justice was not aware of the fact that the prisoner was then subject to a judgment of commitment in the state prison, it would be the duty of the petitioner to inform the court of that fact. The accused may not remain silent at the time of his second sentence respecting his status as a prisoner and then claim the benefit of his own secrecy. Under the last-mentioned section of the Code, it is only "in exceptional cases" that a court has the discretion of administering the penalty of imprisonment for a second "crime" so as to permit it to run concurrently with the commitment for the former felony. This offense does not appear to have been such "an exceptional case" as to warrant the exercise of discretion in pronouncing judgment. No order was made that it should run concurrently with the former judgment of commitment.

The petitioner is therefore not entitled to credit, as a part of his commitment in the state prison, the six-month term during which he wrongfully remained away from that institution after his parole was revoked.

The order granting the writ of habeas corpus is therefore reversed. The petitioner is remanded to the custody of the warden of the state prison at Folsom for the completion of his term of imprisonment.

Rehearing Denied Jan. 28, 1931. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 19, 1931.

1. Master and servant ☞331.

In action against master alone for assault committed by servant, compensatory damages only were recoverable.

2. Assault and battery ☞38.

One suing master for servant's assault could recover for pecuniary loss, physical injuries, pain and suffering, medical and like expenses, and damages for wounded feelings, indignity, and humiliation.

3. Assault and battery ☞40.

$7,500 compensatory damages for assault held excessive.

The injuries to plaintiff, who was 42 years old, consisted chiefly of contusions about the face, several loosened teeth, two of which were extracted, and a compound fracture of jaw. An abscess also developed under covering of jawbone which required two operations, but plaintiff received free medical, surgical, and hospitalization treatment at his employer's hospital, so that his pecuniary loss was confined to loss of wages, amounting to $336.96.

4. Appeal and error ☞1004(1).

Reviewing courts will not interfere, unless verdict is obviously so disproportionate to injuries as justifies belief it was not result of dispassionate discretion of jury.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Franklin A. Griffin, Judge.

Action by Thomas M. O'Donnell against the Excelsior Amusement Company and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal.

Reversed and remanded.

L. S. Hamm, J. G. Moser, and B. E. Kragen, all of San Francisco, for appellants.

Ford & Johnson, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

The respondent, Thomas M. O'Donnell, entered a moving picture theater on Mission street, near Ocean avenue, in San Francisco, without purchasing a ticket, and as a result of the altercation which followed was severely injured by the special police officer of the theater, named Murphy. On account of the injuries respondent brought this action for damages against Murphy's employer, the appellant corporation, and upon trial before a jury was awarded a verdict of $7,500. Judgment was entered accordingly, and, following the denial of a motion for a new trial, this appeal was taken. The sole ground urged for reversal is that the amount of the verdict is grossly excessive; it being contended that the cause should be remanded for a new trial upon the single issue of damages. Morris v. Standard Oil Co., 188 Cal. 468, 205 P. 1073.

The injuries respondent received consisted chiefly of contusions about the face, several loosened teeth, two of which were afterwards extracted, and a compound fracture of the jaw. About two weeks after the injuries were inflicted an abscess developed under the covering of the jawbone, causing much pain and necessitating an operation; and about three weeks later a second and similar operation was performed. The injuries required respondent to remain in the hospital for a period of 42 days and kept him from work 52 days. Aside from the loss of the teeth, a slight impairment of the use of the jaws, and a small scar on the side of the face where the abscess was lanced, no permanent injuries were shown. Respondent stated also that his eyesight and hearing had not been as good since he was injured, but there was no medical testimony produced to prove that either has resulted from these injuries, and in this connection it was shown that he was 42 years old at the time this trouble happened, and that continuously for fifteen years prior thereto he had been employed as a boilermaker in the shops of the Southern Pacific Company, in the southern part of the city; and with reference to his defective hearing he frankly admitted that all of the men engaged in that kind of work sooner or later are affected that way, and that "it had been coming on him" for four or five years. On account of his employment with the railroad company he was put to no expense whatever for the medical, surgical, and hospitalization treatment he received at the hospital. Consequently the pecuniary damage he sustained was confined to the loss of wages, amounting to $336.96, leaving an award of approximately $7,100 as damages for the other elements recoverable in this particular kind of a case.

[1, 2] As indicated, Murphy was not made a party to the action, his employer alone being sued; therefore compensatory damages only, to the exclusion of exemplary damages, were recoverable; and the jury was so instructed. The measure of compensatory damages in an action against the master for an assault committed by the servant is much the same as in other actions for tortious injuries to the person, including, among other elements, recovery for the pecuniary loss, the physical injuries and the consequent pain and suffering, and medical and like expenses; and, in addition thereto, recovery may be had for wounded feelings, indignity, and humiliation. 5 Corpus Juris p. 702; 2 Ruling Case Law, p. 580. In view of this latter element, it becomes necessary to inquire to some extent at least into the circumstances leading up to the alleged assault. In this regard the evidence shows that on the evening in question respondent's daughter, aged 14 years, was attending the theater as a spectator; and, when respondent returned home from his work, he went to the theater for the purpose, so he claims, of accompanying her home. The theater has two front entrance doors, and a doorman was stationed at one of them. Without purchasing a ticket, respondent entered the other door, and the doorman, named Geister, followed him in, and told him that he would have to buy a ticket or leave. Respondent testified that prior to the evening in question he had been given permission by the manager, named Moore, to enter the theater for the purpose of bringing his daughter home, and that he tried to explain the matter to Geister, and asked to see Moore, but that Geister refused to listen, and sent for Murphy; that when Murphy arrived, he, too, refused to listen to any explanation or to call Moore, and taking hold of him told him he "was going out"; that he brushed Murphy's hand aside, and told him to keep his hands off; that thereupon Murphy took hold of him again and shoved him forward toward a room in the front of the theater, and, while holding him with one hand, gave the keys to an attendant with instructions to open the door. Respondent's testimony, in the foregoing respects, was substantially corroborated by another witness, who stated that on the way to the room Murphy struck respondent three times on the chin. Continuing, respondent testified that as soon as the door of the room was opened Murphy shoved him inside and immediately started to beat him about the face with some blunt instrument, inflicting the injuries above described, and knocking him to the floor in a dazed condition; that Moore then appeared and prevented further punishment; that soon afterwards his daughter was allowed to come into the room and took him away; and later he went to the Southern Pacific Hospital for treatment.

Geister testified that as respondent entered the theater he asked him for his ticket and was told "to go to hell"; that, when he followed respondent down the aisle and told him he must either purchase a ticket or leave, respondent again told him "to go to hell"; that thereupon he called Murphy; and that respondent continued to scuffle until put into the room. Briefly stated, Murphy's testimony was that, when respondent refused to buy a ticket or leave, he started to eject him, but that respondent commenced to fight; that he then concluded that respondent should be sent to jail, and accordingly took him to the room to await the arrival of the police patrol wagon; that on the way to the room respondent was fighting "furiously," and that consequently he "gave him a punch"; that when they entered the room respondent continued to fight, and that he "gave him a punch and pushed him around a bit and he fell over, and there was a chair there and desk, and he fell over it," and thereupon he (Murphy) shut the door. Murphy denied striking respondent with any instrument, and Moore, Geister, and Murphy all testified that respondent was under the influence of liquor, but this was denied by respondent.

[3, 4] If the action were brought against Murphy, the one by whom the injuries were inflicted, and the jury were asked to add exemplary damages as a punishment for the assault, the evidence above set forth would be legally sufficient, beyond doubt, to sustain the amount of the award; but, as pointed out, respondent has not chosen to sue the person who made the attack, but has sought to hold his employer responsible therefor, against whom exemplary damages are neither claimed nor recoverable. That being so, we are unable to escape the conclusion that the amount of the verdict is excessive beyond all reasonable limit, it being manifest, we think, that, after making all reasonable allowance for the legitimate elements of damage, the jury lost sight of the fact that the person inflicting the injuries was not being sued, and, despite the instructions of the court to the contrary, awarded damages by way of punishment against his employer. In so holding we are not unmindful of the rule that the matter of excessive damages is one which must be left almost entirely to the determination of the trial court, and that reviewing courts will not interfere, unless the verdict is obviously so disproportionate to the injuries received as to justify the belief that it is not the result of cool and dispassionate discretion of the jury (Szasz v. Joyland Co., 84 Cal. App. 259, 257 P. 871), and to suggest, at first blush, passion and prejudice or corruption on the part of the jury (Reneau v. Hirsch, 88 Cal. App. 1, 262 P. 1100; Morris v. Standard Oil Co., 188 Cal. 468, 205 P. 1073). But, being convinced that in fixing the amount of damages in the present case the jury ignored certain well-defined legal rights to which appellant, as an employer, was clearly entitled, and that the excessive amount it allowed was the product of passion and prejudice, arising from the belief on the part of the jury that the chastisement administered to respondent was unnecessary and wanton, a plain case is presented, we think, where the exercise of the power reserved in the reviewing court is demanded.

The judgment is therefore reversed and the cause remanded for a new trial upon the single issue of damages.

HERRICKS v. F. HENNESSEY CO. et al.

Civ. 7367.

District Court of Appeal, First District,
Division 1, California.

Dec. 26, 1930.

1. Trial ☞339(2).

Where verdict is defective in form, court must call jury's attention thereto and advise them wherein verdict should be corrected (Code Civ. Proc. § 619).

2. Trial ☞339(3).

Where jury returned verdict finding negligence of both parties, court's statement that verdict should be for defendant held not erroneous instruction on negligence (Code Civ. Proc. § 619).

The remarks of the court were not objectionable on the ground that they amounted to instruction on law of negligence and were erroneous in omitting element of proximate cause, since jury had been fully instructed upon the element of proximate cause in connection with the alleged contributory negligence of plaintiff, and it could therefore be assumed that when jury returned their verdict it meant the character of negligence about which they had been instructed; that is, negligence contributing proximately to cause the accident.

KNIGHT, J.

This is an action for damages on account of personal injuries plaintiff claimed to have sustained as a result of a collision between an automobile driven by him and a truck belonging to the defendant corporation and operated by the defendant Costigan. Upon trial before a jury, a verdict was rendered in favor of the defendants, and plaintiff appeals from the judgment entered thereon. The single question involved relates to certain proceedings had after the cause had been submitted to the jury, and just prior to the rendition of its verdict.

Plaintiff's cause of action was based upon the alleged negligence of the driver of the truck; and one of the defenses urged was that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence. The court fully, fairly, and correctly instructed the jury upon the law relating to those issues, and several times throughout its charge informed the jury in substance that contributory negligence, to bar a recovery, must proximately contribute to the happening of the accident. After the jury had deliberated for some time, it returned into court, and upon inquiry by the court the foreman announced that the jury had agreed upon a verdict. Thereupon the following proceedings took place:

"The Court: Read your verdict, Mr. Foreman.

"The Foreman: 'We the jury in the above entitled cause find negligence on the part of both parties by a vote of nine to three.'

"The Court: Read that again.

"The Foreman: 'We the jury in the above entitled cause find negligence on the part of both parties by a vote of nine to three.'

"The Court: Yes, that is proper but I might add to that that finding negligence of both parties, under the instructions of the court, your verdict should have been for the defendant.

"The Foreman: There was little doubt on that point.

"The Court: If you find any negligence on the part of the plaintiff then the plaintiff will not recover."

The court then requested the jury to retire and correct the verdict "in that way," adding; "that is, if you agree to it." Whereupon the jury again retired and subsequently returned a verdict in due form, finding for the defendants.

[1] The contention plaintiff makes is that the remarks of the court amounted to an instruction upon the law of negligence, and that since the element of proximate cause was omitted therefrom the instruction was erroneous. In our opinion there is no merit in the contention. Section 619 of the Code of Civil Procedure reads as follows: "When the verdict is announced, if it is informal or insufficient, in not covering the issue submitted, it may be corrected by the jury under the advice of the court, or the jury may be again sent out." And in construing said section it has been held that while a trial court may not interfere with or control the jury in passing upon the evidence, it may nevertheless exercise a salutary supervisory power over their verdict (People v. Knutte, 111 Cal. 453, 44 P. 166; Redo y Cia v. First National Bank, 200 Cal. 161, 252 P. 587); that where the verdict is defective in form it becomes the court's duty to call the attention of the jury to such fact and to advise them wherein it should be corrected; and that the correction may be made in the presence of the court, or the jury may retire to further consider their verdict and put it in proper form (Stewart v. Taylor, 68 Cal. 5, 8 P. 605).

[2] As stated, the jury in the present case had been fully instructed upon the element of proximate cause in connection with the alleged contributory negligence of the plaintiff, one of the instructions being to the effect that the defense of contributory negligence was not established unless it was "proved by a preponderance of the evidence that the injuries sustained by plaintiff were the result of his own negligence proximately contributing thereto. * * ". In another, after stating that if the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence he could not recover, the court added: "By contributory negligence I mean negligence on the part of the plaintiff which is in some degree a contributing, proximate or direct cause of the accident." And then summarizing the law upon the subject the court stated: " * * One of your first considerations in determining the matters involved herein is (what) was the proximate or direct cause of the collision. In determining this fact, you must take into consideration all the evidence before you and from this evidence determine the direct cause of the accident. When you have determined the direct cause of the accident, then it is your duty to determine whether the plaintiff or the defendants were responsible for the cause or causes. If the plaintiff himself is responsible, then your judgment must be for the defendants and against the plaintiff. If both the defendants and the plaintiff were responsible, then your judgment must be for the defendant and against the plaintiff."

It may be fairly assumed, therefore, that when the jury returned the informal verdict finding "negligence on the part of both parties" it meant the character of negligence about which it had been instructed, namely, negligence contributing proximately to the cause of the accident. That being so, the verdict should have been in favor of the defendants. But, as already appears, it was not in that form, and consequently, under said section 619, it became the duty of the court to have it corrected, which it proceeded to do, by explaining to the jury, in effect, that having found negligence on the part of both parties, "under the instructions of the court" its verdict should be for the defendant, provided such was the verdict agreed upon. It is plain to be seen, therefore, that the remarks complained of were never intended as an additional instruction as to the law of the case, but merely as directions to the jury to correct the form of its verdict so that it would conform legally to its expressed finding. And the fact that the jury had already been fully instructed as to the law of the case and asked for no further instructions, either before or after the matter of the form of the verdict was disposed of, confirms the belief that it accepted the remarks as they were intended and was in no manner misled thereby.

Even construing the remarks as an instruction as to the law of the case, no sufficient grounds for reversal are shown, because, as will be noted, the remarks were qualified by the clause "under the instructions of the court," which had the effect of connecting the same directly with and making them a part of the instructions theretofore given (Hall v. Steele, 193 Cal. 602, 226 P. 854), and the latter, as already pointed out, fully covered the element of proximate cause.

The judgment is affirmed.

NOURSE, P. J.

Plaintiffs sued for damages for fraud in relation to a real estate transaction. Defendant surety company was joined as the surety on the bond of Lloyd and McElmeel, who were real estate brokers. Defendant Hughes was an employee and salesman for the brokers. Plaintiffs had judgment against the surety company on its bond for $2,000, and that defendant appeals on a typewritten clerk's transcript.

[1] The appeal being on the judgment roll, no question of fact is involved. The trial court found that Hughes, while acting in the scope of his employment by the brokers, induced the plaintiffs to purchase real property in the state of Nebraska through fraudulent misrepresentations, resulting in damage to plaintiffs in the sum of $2,000.

The first attack on the judgment is that the complaint fails to state a cause of action because it does not allege that Hughes was acting for a compensation. This, it is argued, is necessary because a real estate broker is defined in the statute (St. 1919, p. 1252, § 2, as amended by St. 1925, p. 600) as one "who, for a compensation, sells, or offers for sale, buys, or offers to buy, or negotiates the purchase or sale or exchange of real estate." The complaint alleges that Lloyd and McElmeel were copartners duly licensed as real estate brokers under the fictitious name of West Coast Colonization Company, and that Hughes was employed by them as a duly licensed real estate salesman. It is then alleged that, while acting as such salesman and agent, Hughes conducted the transactions complained of. By stipulation of the parties there has been added to the record a written agreement under which plaintiffs promised to pay a commission to Hughes when the Nebraska land was sold.

[2] At the outset we may concede that pleadings of this character are not to be approved. If the point had been raised on demurrer, the defect might have been easily remedied, and, so far as we may know from the record brought up, this might have been done during the course of the trial. When the objection to the complaint may be cured by stipulation or by the admission of proof without objection, we may assume that it has been cured when the point is raised for the first time on an appeal based on the judgment roll alone. We so held in Nittler v. Continental Casualty Co., 94 Cal. App. 498, 504, 271 P. 555, 272 P. 309, and appellant has given us no reason why we should change our views.

[3] It is argued that the surety company cannot be held liable for fraudulent acts of the brokers' employees because the bond ran to the brokers alone. The point is without merit. The bond is a "faithful performance" bond. Bridges v. Price, 95 Cal. App. 394, 273 P. 72; Hogberg v. Landfield, 99 Cal. App. 360, 278 P. 907. The bond was conditioned that the brokers would "faithfully perform every undertaking entered into by (them) as a licensed real estate broker under said act." The complaint alleged, and the trial court found, that the acts complained of were done by Hughes as agent for and within the scope of his employment by the brokers. The liability of the principal for the acts of his agent in the scope of the employment is fixed by section 2330, Civil Code, and other authority does not need to be cited. The surety having undertaken to insure the faithful performance of the brokers' duties under the act, the bond included the acts of the brokers' agents who were employed, and licensed under the same act, to perform those duties.

[4, 5] But it is argued that, because under the Real Estate Act (St. 1919, p. 1259, § 15) a broker's license cannot be revoked for the default of an agent unless the broker had guilty knowledge of the default, therefore, the broker cannot be held liable on his bond unless he had guilty knowledge of the acts of his agent. These provisions of the Real Estate Act are penal and are confined to the punishment that may be inflicted on the broker by the real estate commissioner. They have no application to the civil liability of the broker for the wrongs of his agent. This liability is fixed by the general law of agency applying equally to the contractual relations between principal and agent and to those dealing with them as such. If the Real Estate Act had intended to modify this general rule, it would have used some language indicating that intention. But it is apparent that such was not the intention from the language which confines the section of the act to the proceedings under the act for a revocation or suspension of the broker's license.

For the reasons given, the judgment and order are both affirmed.

Division 2, California.
Dec. 23, 1930.

1. Conspiracy ☞18.

Complaint alleging defendants conspired to defraud plaintiffs of property and seeking cancellation of instruments conveying property and accounting held good against general demurrer.

The complaint alleged in substance that defendants conspired to defraud plaintiffs of property, and as part of conspiracy induced plaintiffs to enter into contract with certain defendants for construction of an apartment house building on lot involved and to execute promissory note secured by mortgages, and later induced plaintiffs to convey other property to other defendants in order to clear mortgages, and as result of transactions plaintiffs lost to defendants all their real property. The prayer was for cancellation of certain instruments, reconveyance of property, and for an accounting.

Reversed, with directions.

NOURSE, P. J.

Plaintiffs sued for the cancellation of a number of separate written instruments conveying separate pieces of realty and for an accounting of the rents, issues, and profits of such realty. Demurrers to the fifth amended complaint were sustained without leave to amend, but the trial court granted plaintiffs leave to move to amend if a proposed amendment was presented with the motion. This was done, and the trial court again denied leave to amend and entered judgment for the defendants. The plaintiffs appeal upon a typewritten clerk's transcript which contains the fifth amended complaint and the proposed amendment.

In the fifth amended complaint it is alleged that the plaintiffs were owners of several distinct pieces of real property situated in Los Angeles and Imperial counties; that on July 22, 1922, the defendants conspired for the purpose of defrauding plaintiffs out of said properties, and that, as a part of said conspiracy, induced plaintiffs to enter into a contract with defendants Hesse and wife for the construction of an apartment house building on one of said lots located in the Crown Hill tract in the city of Los Angeles; that, as a part of said conspiracy, the plaintiffs were induced to execute and deliver to the Hesses two promissory notes amounting to $50,000 secured by mortgages on said Crown Hill lot; that the Hesses fraudulently delayed the completion of said building for a period of more than fourteen months, and transferred to other of the defendants the two notes and mortgages; that these latter defendants then threatened to foreclose said mortgages, unless the plaintiffs should convey to them other real property, which was done; that thereafter the defendant Folcey and wife came into the transaction, telling the plaintiffs that the other defendants were all crooks and were conspiring to defraud them of their properties, but that, if the plaintiffs would transfer to them other properties owned by them, they, these defendants, would clear the mortgages mentioned and save all these properties to the plaintiffs. All these acts were alleged to have been taken with the knowledge and connivance of all the defendants as part of a general conspiracy to defraud the plaintiffs. As a result of these transactions, it was alleged that the plaintiffs lost to the defendants all their real property valued at $60,000. The prayer was for a cancellation of all the written instruments, a reconveyance of these properties, and for an accounting.

[1, 2] The fifth amended complaint manifestly stated a cause of action, and was good against the general demurrer. If it had pleaded damage in a specific amount and had prayed for a recovery of damages instead of for equitable relief, it would have been in line with Mox, Inc., v. Woods, 202 Cal. 675, 262 P. 302. As said in that case (page 677 of 202 Cal., 262 P. 302, 303): "The elements of an action for civil conspiracy are the formation and operation of the conspiracy and damage resulting to plaintiff from an act or acts done in furtherance of the common design. The cause of action is the damage suffered."

[3] The only substantial objection to the complaint is that it states several separate causes of action and does not state them separately, as required by section 427, Code of Civil Procedure. This arises because the complaint seeks the cancellation of separate written instruments affecting several pieces of property. If the plaintiffs had sued in tort for the monetary damages suffered from the entire transaction, their complaint would have been free from this objection as well, because, each separate overt act being alleged to be a part of the whole conspiracy, each conspirator is rendered responsible for the wrongful act, irrespective of the degree of his activity. Mox, Inc., v. Woods, supra, page 678 of 202 Cal., 262 P. 302.

Such being the rule applicable in action sounding in tort, we are confronted with the question whether, when the action is in equity and seeks the return of specific real property, a different rule should be applied. Manifestly, in such a case some of the alleged conspirators might be improper parties because no relief could be given against them, but otherwise we see no reason why the action cannot be maintained in equity as well as in tort.

[4] The general demurrer to the fifth amended complaint should have been overruled. The special demurrer raising the objection of separate causes of action not separately stated was properly sustained. The proposed amended complaint removed this objection limiting the cause to the Crown Hill lot together with plaintiffs' pecuniary damage for loss of possession of that lot. The cause as pleaded in the proposed sixth complaint is one for the recovery of a specified tract of land and damages for its loss. This proposed complaint is precisely the same as that which was held good in the Mox Case, with the single exception that it seeks recovery of specific property in addition to the prayer for damages. If, in respect to the real property, the plaintiffs seek more than they are entitled to, their complaint is not defective for that reason.

The judgment is reversed, with directions to permit plaintiffs to file the proposed amended complaint.

As Modified Jan. 15, 1931.

1. Justices of the peace ☞59.

Nothing is to be presumed in favor of jurisdiction of justice's court.

2. Justices of the peace ☞48.

Justice's court held without jurisdiction of statutory proceeding to determine title to attached property after third party claim and indemnity bond given by attaching creditor (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 866-869, § 549 as amended by St. 1891, p. 20, § 1, and § 689 as amended by St. 1929, p. 661).

Petition for writ of prohibition by Erich P. Schwandt against the Justice's Court of San Diego Township and another.

Writ issued.

Brooks Gifford and William E. Fox, both of Pasadena, and Stickney & Stickney, of San Diego, for petitioner.

Chester Allan Smith, of San Diego, for respondents.

CARY, P. J.

The petition for a writ of prohibition alleges, in substance, that in an action to which petitioner is not a party a certain automobile upon which petitioner holds a $1,500 mortgage has been attached under a writ issuing from the justice's court of San Diego township, that petitioner duly filed a third party claim for said property, that the plaintiff in said action filed a bond to indemnify the constable, that the constable now holds said property, and that proceedings have been instituted in said justice's court to try the title to said automobile under the provisions of Code of Civil Procedure, § 689, that petitioner filed objections in said justice's court upon the grounds that said court was without jurisdiction to try said title, that said objections were overruled, and that said court will proceed to try said title unless prohibited therefrom.

[1, 2] Petitioner's chief contention is that the justice's court is without jurisdiction for the reason that Code of Civil Procedure, § 689, in so far as it provides for a method of trying title to attached property, does not apply to justice's courts.

The article in the Code of Civil Procedure dealing expressly with procedure on attachment in justice's courts is very brief and includes but four sections, 866-869 inclusive, but by the provisions of the last of these, section 869, certain other sections of that Code regarding attachments in the superior court are also made applicable to the justice's courts, among them being section 549.

That section as it has stood since amended in 1891 (St. 1891, p. 20, § 2) provides: "If any personal property attached be claimed by a third person as his property, the same rules shall prevail as to the contents and making of said claim, and as to the holding of said property, as in case of a claim after levy upon execution, as provided for in section six hundred and eighty-nine of the Code of Civil Procedure."

Turning now to section 689 and tracing its history we find that the same session of the Legislature which amended section 549 to read as given above, amended section 689 (St. 1891, p. 20, § 1) to read as follows: "If the property levied on be claimed by a third person as his property by a written claim verified by the oath of said claimant, setting out his title thereto, his right to the possession thereof, and stating the grounds of such title, and served upon the Sheriff, the Sheriff is not bound to keep the property, unless the plaintiff, or the person in whose favor the writ of execution runs, on demand, indemnify the Sheriff against such claim by an undertaking by at least two good and sufficient sureties; and no claim to such property is valid against the Sheriff, or shall be received, or be notice of any rights, unless made as above provided."

As these two sections then stood, the construction of the language of section 549 presents no difficulty, since clearly its language related to and embraced the whole of the then provisions of section 689.

However, in 1929 the Legislature amended section 689 (St. 1929, p. 661), modifying in several particulars the procedure theretofore embodied in that section, and in addition adding an entirely new paragraph as follows: "Whenever a verified third party claim is served upon the sheriff, upon levy of execution, the plaintiff, or the person in whose favor the writ of execution runs, shall be entitled to a hearing within twenty days therefrom, before the court having jurisdiction of the action, in order to determine title to the property in question, which hearing must be granted by the said court upon the filing of an application or petition therefor. Ten days' notice of such hearing must be given to all parties claiming an interest in the property, or their attorneys, which notice must specify that the hearing is for the purpose of determining title to the property in question. The court may continue the hearing beyond the said twenty-day period, but good cause must be shown for any such continuance."

It is under this last-quoted provision that the justice's court in the case at bar is assuming to act. The question presented then is: Where property has been attached under a writ issued from a justice's court, a third party claim made to said property, and an indemnity bond given the constable by the attaching creditor, does the justice's court have jurisdiction to hear a petition to determine title to the property under the provisions of section 689?

If section 549 stated merely that the same procedure should be followed in attachments as provided by section 689 for execution, no question such as that here presented could arise. But it does not so state. What it does state is that, "as to the contents and making of said claim and as to the holding of said property" the same rules as provided by section 689 shall prevail. This language is specific and, so far as attachments are concerned, limits the scope of section 689 to two matters—the making of the claim and the holding of the property. When we consider the further well-established principle that the justice's court is a court of limited jurisdiction and that nothing is to be presumed in favor of its jurisdiction, it is clear that, as applied to justice's courts at least, the language of section 549 may not be taken to include the new procedure for trying title provided for by the 1929 amendment to section 689.

It is ordered that the writ of prohibition issue as prayed for.

HUNT v. LOS ANGELES RY. CORPORATION.
Civ. 7656.

District Court of Appeal, First District,
Division 1, California.
Dec. 16, 1930.

1. Evidence ⇨586(3, 4).

Positive testimony that bus causing injury sounded warning did not conclusively establish that warning was given but merely created conflict with negative testimony that no warning was sounded.

2. Death ⇨23.

Contributory negligence may be invoked in action by parent for death of child of age sufficient to exercise discretion to avoid injury.

3. Negligence ⇨85(2).

Child need only exercise care ordinarily exercised by minors of like age and discretion.

4. Negligence ⇨136(29).

Capacity of particular child to exercise care to avoid particular danger is question for jury.

5. Automobiles ⇨212.

Bicycle riders have same right as automobile drivers to use streets, and are chargeable only with such ordinary care for own safety as prudent person of like age and experience would exercise.

6. Automobiles ⇨223(1).

Child in public street is not trespasser, but has same right as operator of automobile or other vehicle.

7. Automobiles ⇨172(13).

Bus driver ordinarily need not give warning in passing bicycle in business district, but must drive with due caution (St. 1923, p. 557, §§ 121, 125).

8. Automobiles ⇨151.

That operation of automobile produces noise does not relieve driver of duty to warn, where persons rightfully using highway are unaware of automobile's approach (St. 1923, p. 557, §§ 121, 125).

9. Negligence ⇨85(6).

Conduct by child which might otherwise constitute negligence cannot be so considered where done in emergency calculated to produce fright.

10. Automobiles ⇨168(1).

Automobile driver seeing child in place of danger, or reasonably apprehending that approach without warning would frighten child, must keep car under control reasonably necessary to avoid collision.

11. Negligence ⇨85(6).

If defendant's negligence caused fear impelling child to rush into danger, mere mistake of judgment does not necessarily constitute contributory negligence.

12. Automobiles ⇨223(7).

Child, after mounting bicycle and proceeding on his course, was under no duty to look back to see whether bus was approaching.

13. Automobiles ⇨245(74).

Contributory negligence of child eleven years old colliding with bus while riding bicycle held for jury (St. 1923, pp. 553, 557, §§ 113, 121, 125, and § 114 (page 554), as amended by St. 1925, p. 412, § 14).

Evidence tended to show that child eleven years old riding on bicycle turned to left because of bewilderment of child caused by approach of bus; that bus was traveling 25 miles an hour, exceeding speed limit for business or residence district permitted by St. 1923, pp. 553, 557, §§ 113, 121, 125, and § 114 (page 554), as amended by St. 1925, p. 412, § 14; and that no warning was given by driver of bus.

14. Automobiles ⇨245(57).

Sudden warning by young girl to eleven year old boy riding bicycle of approaching bus held not necessarily sole proximate cause of accident; question being for jury.

15. Negligence ⇨61(1).

Where injury results from separate acts by different persons operating concurrently, both are proximate cause.

16. Automobiles ⇨245(74).

Contributory negligence of eleven year old child riding bicycle and turning in front of bus held for jury, though child was accustomed to operate bicycle and was of average intelligence.

17. Trial ⇨139(1).

To justify directed verdict, it must appear that any other holding would have to be reversed for lack of evidentiary support.

18. Automobiles ⇨245(8).

Where evidence was reasonably sufficient to support verdict for plaintiff for death of child struck by bus, directed verdict for defendant was erroneous.

Action by Eugene Hunt against the Los Angeles Railway Corporation. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals.

Reversed.

Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher, of Los Angeles (Norman S. Sterry and Malcolm Davis, both of Los Angeles, of counsel), for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

An appeal by the plaintiff from a judgment entered on a directed verdict in favor of defendant Los Angeles Railway Corporation.

The plaintiff was the father of Gillard Hunt, a minor, who was run over and killed by a motorbus operated by the defendant. The complaint alleged that his death was due to the negligent operation of the bus; the defendant denied the negligence alleged, and as a separate defense averred contributory negligence on the part of the minor. At the close of the evidence the court on motion directed the jury to return a verdict for the defendant.

It is urged as grounds for the appeal that, in view of the evidence, the case should have been submitted to the jury.

[1] The accident happened on September 15, 1925, at about 5 o'clock p. m. The boy, who was about eleven years old, was riding a bicycle in a southerly direction along La Brea avenue in Los Angeles. The motorbus was following him on the same avenue, and at a point between Eighth and Ninth streets, which intersect the avenue, overtook him. The testimony was conflicting as to whether the boy fell to the pavement in front of the bus or turned the bicycle to the left so that he was struck by the vehicle. The distance between the bicycle and the bus when the latter was about to pass was variously estimated. The driver estimated it was about four feet, and the estimates of other witnesses varied from two to four feet. It is certain, however, that the bus passed so close to the left of the bicycle that a slight swerve by the rider to the left was likely to cause him injury. According to the testimony, the boy was warned of the imminent approach of the bus by a young girl standing on the sidewalk south of the point where the collision occurred. He thereupon turned his body and head to the left and looked in the direction of the oncoming bus, and at the same time, according to some of the witnesses, swerved the bicycle to the left sufficiently to be struck by the front of the vehicle. Several witnesses also testified that upon discovering the proximity of the bus he appeared to be greatly frightened. The driver of the bus testified that he sounded a warning before the collision, but how long before he did not say. All the other witnesses, however, who were questioned on the subject—several of whom were passengers on the bus—testified that they heard no warning sounded. The fact that there was positive testimony on the subject did not conclusively establish that a warning was given; it merely created a conflict; and the evidence was sufficient to sustain a finding to the contrary. Thompson v. Los Angeles, etc., Ry. Co., 165 Cal. 748, 134 P. 709; Young v. Pacific Elec. Ry. Co., 208 Cal. 568, 283 P. 61. The driver further testified that the speed of the bus at the time of the accident was fifteen to eighteen miles per hour, but a witness who was following in an automobile estimated the speed at about twenty-five miles an hour. The latter speed in a business or residence district was in excess of that permitted by law. Motor Vehicle Act, § 113, Stats. 1923, pp. 517, 553, 554, and section 114, as amended by Stats. 1925, pp. 398, 412, § 14.

[2-4] The defense of contributory negligence may be invoked in an action by a parent to recover damages for the death of a child where the latter was of an age sufficient to exercise discretion for the avoidance of injury. Studer v. Southern Pacific Co., 121 Cal. 400, 53 P. 942, 66 Am. St. Rep. 39. But a child is not held to the same degree of care as an adult, and is only required to exercise the degree of care which is ordinarily exercised by minors of like age, mental capacity, and discretion. There is no precise age at which as a matter of law a child is to be held accountable for his actions to the same extent as one of full age. The question as to the capacity of a particular child at the time to exercise care to avoid a particular danger is one of fact falling within the province of the jury to determine. Cahill v. E. B. & A. L. Stone Co., 167 Cal. 126, 138 P. 712, 717. The rule has been applied in cases where the age of children sought to be charged with contributory negligence varied from twelve to fourteen years. Cahill v. Stone Co., supra; Bowdoin v. Southern Pacific Co., 178 Cal. 634, 174 P. 664; Morris v. Standard Oil Co., 188 Cal. 468, 205 P. 1073; Schroeder v. Baumgarteker, 202 Cal. 626, 262 P. 740; Greeneich v. Knoll, 73 Cal. App. 1, 238 P. 163.

[5, 6] Bicycle riders have the same right as automobile drivers to the use of the streets, and the former are chargeable only with such ordinary care for their own safety as a prudent person of like age, intelligence, and experience would exercise under the same or similar circumstances. Schroeder v. Baumgarteker, supra. Nor is a child in a public street a trespasser; his right there being the same as the operator of an automobile or other vehicle. Wong Kit v. Crescent Creamery Co., 87 Cal. App. 563, 262 P. 481.

[7, 8] While the accident appears to have occurred in a business district, and under ordinary circumstances the driver of the bus would not be required to give warning before passing the bicycle (Motor Vehicle Act, § 125, Stats. 1923, p. 557), nevertheless the statute required him to drive with due caution and circumspection, and forbade the operation of the bus in a manner endangering the life or limb of any person (Motor Vehicle Act, § 121, St. 1923, p. 557). And it has been held to be the duty of the driver to sound the horn when the conditions are such as to require timely warning of the approach of the automobile. Dullanty v. Smith, 203 Cal. 621, 265 P. 814; McManus v. Arnold Taxi Corp., 82 Cal. App. 215, 255 P. 755. Nor under such circumstances does the fact that the operation of the automobile is productive of noise relieve the driver of the duty to give warning where it appears that persons rightfully using the highway are unaware of his approach. Devecchio v. Ricketts, 66 Cal. App. 334, 226 P. 11.

[9-11] Conduct which might otherwise constitute negligence on the part of a child may not be so considered where its acts or omissions were done or omitted in an emergency calculated to produce fright, bewilderment, or confusion (45 Cor. Jur., Negligence, § 559, p. 1011); and, while a driver in approaching a child upon a street or highway is not bound to guard against every possible contingency, nevertheless, where he sees a child in a place of danger, or might reasonably apprehend that if approached without warning the child would through fright or bewilderment place itself in a place of danger, it is his duty to keep his car under such control as would be reasonably necessary to avoid a collision (Silberstein v. Showell, etc., Co., 267 Pa. 298, 109 A. 701; Leonard v. Fowle, 255 Mass. 531, 152 N. E. 240; Chaar v. McLoon, 304 Mo. 238, 263 S. W. 174; Metcalf v. Romano, 83 Cal. App. 508, 257 P. 114). As has been held with respect to the conduct of adults under similar circumstances, if the negligence of the defendant caused fear and loss of presence of mind on the part of the injured person so as to impel him to rush into danger, his mere error or mistake of judgment does not necessarily constitute contributory negligence as a matter of law. Raymond v. Hill, 168 Cal. 473, 143 P. 743; Hatzakorizan v. Rucker-Fuller Desk Co., 197 Cal. 82, 239 P. 709, 41 A. L. R. 1027; Randolph v. Hunt, 41 Cal. App. 739, 183 P. 358.

[12, 13] Respondent cites numerous decisions in support of its contention that the child by his failure to observe the approaching bus, or to follow a direct course, or give the signal required by law if he intended to turn, was necessarily guilty of contributory negligence. These cases, however, involved the acts of adults and not of children. The child proceeded from a point about half a block north of the place where the accident occurred. There is no evidence that he looked to the north before mounting his bicycle, or that if he had he would necessarily have seen the bus; and there was no duty to do so after he had proceeded on his course. Hatzakorizan v. Rucker-Fuller Desk Co., supra. While it is the rule that persons using the streets must anticipate and be prepared for the presence of vehicles thereon, and it is also the duty of operators of vehicles to give the proper signals before turning (Litherbury v. Kimmet, 183 Cal. 24, 195 P. 660), the evidence tends to show that the turn to the left was due to the bewilderment of the child; and, considering his age, the speed of the bus, the evidence that no warning was given by the driver, and the condition of fright into which he was apparently thrown by the sudden appearance of the vehicle, the question of his negligence was, we think, properly one to be determined by the jury.

[14, 15] Nor is there any merit in the argument that the warning by the young girl mentioned must have been the sole proximate cause of the accident. Where the injury results from two separate and distinct acts by different persons operating simultaneously and concurrently, both are the proximate cause; and this question was also one for the jury. Merrill v. Los Angeles G. & E. Co., 158 Cal. 499, 111 P. 534, 31 L. R. A. (N. S.) 559, 139 Am. St. Rep. 134; Katz v. Helbing, 205 Cal. 629, 271 P. 1062, 62 A. L. R. 825; Parkin v. Grayson-Owen Co., 25 Cal. App. 269, 143 P. 257.

It has been held that the action of a trial court in determining whether a child was sufficiently familiar with the dangers incident to his acts or omissions to render him guilty of contributory negligence, and in granting or denying a motion for nonsuit on that ground, will not be disturbed on appeal in the absence of a clear abuse of discretion. Wallace v. Great Western Power Co., 204 Cal. 15, 266 P. 281. In the case cited—which was one to recover for the death of a boy twelve years of age—it appeared that the deceased had climbed upon an electric power pole thirty-three feet in height, which carried a high-voltage cable, with which he came in contact and was killed. In view of these facts, it was held that there was no abuse of discretion in granting a nonsuit. The court referred to Mayne v. San Diego Electric Ry. Co., 179 Cal. 173, 175 P. 690, wherein the above rule was declared, and in which it appeared that a boy about eight years of age was struck by defendant's car while attempting to cross the track in the middle of the block. It was claimed that defendant was negligent in keeping the roadbed alongside of the track in repair, due to which the boy stumbled and fell in front of the car. One of the defenses was the alleged contributory negligence of the child. A motion for an instructed verdict was denied. In affirming the judgment, which was for the plaintiff, the court, following Cahill v. Stone Co., supra, held that there was no precise age at which as a matter of law a child is to be held accountable for his actions to the same extent as one of full age, and further, quoting from Foley v. Cal. Horseshoe Co., 115 Cal. 184, 47 P. 42, 56 Am. St. Rep. 87, that "these matters, and the further question whether the minor duly exercised such judgment as he possessed, must therefore, as a rule, be left as considerations of fact for the jury's determination; and it would be an exceptional case which would present them as unmixed questions of law for the determination of the court."

[16, 17] Although the child appears to have been used to operating his bicycle over city streets, and also to have been of the average intelligence of children of his age, nevertheless we think under the above rule the question of his negligence was one for the jury. To justify a directed verdict, it must appear that no other reasonable conclusion than that defendant was entitled to judgment was legally deducible from the evidence, and that any other holding would be so lacking in evidentiary support that an appellate court would be bound to reverse it on appeal. Bannister v. Los Angeles Ry. Corp., 203 Cal. 427, 264 P. 756; Young v. Pacific Elec. Ry. Co., supra.

[18] The evidence was reasonably sufficient to have supported a verdict for the plaintiff; and, in view of the law, the order directing a verdict for the defendant was erroneous.

The judgment is reversed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. J. Trabucco, Judge.

Action by Giovanni Cassinelli against Herman Bennen, alias Herman Behnen. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

Henry Heidelberg, of San Francisco, Alberta Belford, of Los Angeles (Emery H. Mitchell, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for appellant.

Edmund J. Holl, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

About 4:15 o'clock in the morning, in the month of July, 1927, respondent, Giovanni Cassinelli, while on his way to work, alighted from a south-bound Valencia street car at Eighteenth street in San Francisco, and after the car continued on he proceeded to cross to the east side of the street. Just as he was about to step on the sidewalk he was struck and injured by a jitney bus driven by the appellant Herman Behnen. As a result of the injuries received he brought this action for damages and a jury awarded him a verdict of $3,000. From the judgment entered thereon this appeal was taken, three grounds for reversal being urged, first, that the evidence fails to show negligence on the part of the appellant; second, that the evidence shows contributory negligence on the part of respondent; and, third, that the court committed error in giving certain instructions to the jury.

The evidence relating to the cause of the accident consisted of the testimony given by the two parties. Respondent testified that when the street car stopped he stepped down from the rear platform thereof into the center of the safety zone and waited for the car to continue on; that after the car crossed Eighteenth street he looked in a northerly direction, toward Market street, and, no vehicle being in sight, he started to walk easterly across Valencia street; that when he reached a point between the north and south bound car tracks he again looked to the north and also to the south, up and down Valencia street, and observed an automobile approaching on Valencia street from the south; that it was then on the farther side of the Eighteenth street intersection, traveling northerly along the north-bound track; that when it neared the safety zone on the southerly side of the intersection it turned off the track to the right to go around the safety zone, and upon passing the safety zone and reaching the middle of the intersection it turned back again slightly toward the north-bound track, at which time he had reached a point about midway between the north-bound track and the east curb line of Valencia street; and that just as he was about to step up on the curb he was struck by the automobile and knocked part way upon the sidewalk, the automobile proceeding on about 10 feet, and running part way up on the sidewalk before it was brought to a stop. He further testified that the weather was clear and dry. The driver's view of the Eighteenth street intersection was "obstructed," as that term is defined by section 113 of the California Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 517), and consequently the limitation of speed across the intersection was 15 miles an hour. Respondent testified that on approaching and entering the intersection the automobile was traveling between 25 and 30 miles an hour.

Appellant testified in substance that upon observing the approach of the south-bound Valencia street car he turned off of the north-bound car track to the right and proceeded to drive between the north-bound track and the east curb of the street; that he crossed the intersection at a speed of 15 miles an hour, and then increased his speed to 22 miles an hour, at which time he saw respondent approximately 30 feet in front of him and about 8 feet to his left, on the easterly rail of the north-bound track; that at that time respondent was running toward the east side of Valencia street, and that he continued to run in front of his automobile until he reached a point about 25 feet northerly of the northeast corner of the sidewalk, where the accident occurred.

[1-3] It is evident from the foregoing that there is a sharp conflict in the evidence as to all the essential facts, and, consequently, regardless of the exact speed the automobile was being operated across the intersection, it was purely a question of fact for the jury to determine from all the evidence before it whether the accident was caused, as respondent claims, by the negligent operation of the automobile, in that the driver thereof failed to see respondent until he was only 30 feet away; or whether, as appellant claims, respondent was guilty of contributory negligence in running heedlessly in front of the approaching automobile, thereby failing to use ordinary care for his own safety. And the jury having accepted and acted upon the testimony of respondent, which is legally sufficient to sustain the verdict, its decision in the matter is controlling on appeal. Firth v. Southern Pacific Co., 44 Cal. App. 511, 186 P. 815; White v. Davis (Cal. App.) 284 P. 1086; Darling v. Pacific Electric Ry. Co., 197 Cal. 702, 242 P. 703.

[4-6] Nor has appellant pointed out any error in the instructions which in our opinion would justify a reversal of the judgment. Instruction No. 2, fairly interpreted, is not open to the objection that it assumes negligence on the part of appellant, the words at the beginning thereof being: "If you believe from the evidence," etc. (State Compensation Ins. Fund v. Lamb, 96 Cal. App. 236, 273 P. 1080; Dougherty v. Ellingson, 97 Cal. App.

87, 275 P. 456; Baillargeon v. Myers, 180 Cal. 504, 182 P. 37); and the doctrine of proximate cause was amply covered in several other instructions. Appellant concedes that the substance of instruction 4 "strictly speaking * * * is true." It was to the effect that, if the defendant could by the exercise of ordinary care have avoided the accident, then it was not an unavoidable accident; and we find nothing in the wording thereof which is either argumentative or misleading. Instruction No. 6 was based upon the testimony given by respondent, and the objection appellant makes to it is grounded upon the assumption that the contradictory testimony given by appellant was true. It is well settled, however, that each party is entitled to instructions based on his theory of the case providing there is evidence to support it. Brooks v. City of Monterey (Cal. App.) 290 P. 540; Raymond v. Hill, 168 Cal. 473, 143 P. 743. Therefore instruction No. 6 was not erroneous. Instruction No. 7 was to the effect that the driver of an automobile must at all times have his automobile under proper control; and appellant contends that the instruction is erroneous in omitting to define what is proper control. The words "proper control," as used in this regard, are essentially no different from those of similar import, such as "proper lookout," "proper," "reasonable precaution," and "due care," etc., the use of which has been approved. Burk v. Extra-fine Bread Bakery, 208 Cal. 105, 280 P. 522; Ballos v. Natural, 93 Cal. App. 601, 269 P. 972; Nichols v. Nelson, 80 Cal. App. 590, 252 P. 739; Raymond v. Hill, supra; City of Sacramento v. Hunger, 79 Cal. App. 234, 249 P. 223. Moreover, the charge of the court covers 20 pages of the typewritten transcript, and many of the instructions given, of which a considerable number were proposed by appellant, dealt with the duties and obligations imposed upon the driver of an automobile under the circumstances here present. Therefore, reading the instructions as a whole, the jury was amply instructed upon the subject of proper control. The case of Hesler v. California Hospital Company, 178 Cal. 764, 174 P. 654, is not in point, for there the question of what constituted "proper care" had relation to the technical and professional skill required in the treatment of a patient in a hospital.

The court used the words "negligent defendant" in instruction 18, in stating the law as to contributory negligence, but upon reading the entire instruction it would seem that the words were used in a hypothetical sense; and there is no reason to believe that the jury did not so understand it. The words, "the proximate cause of," as used in instruction No. 19, were immediately followed by the words "or proximately contributed to." The instruction consequently correctly stated the law. Instruction No. 20 was clearly proper. Benjamin v. Noonan, 207 Cal. 279, 277 P. 1045; Loggie v. Interstate Transit Co. (Cal. App.) 291 P. 618.

The judgment is affirmed.

110 Cal. App. 428

TYSON v. BURTON.
Civ. 4226.

District Court of Appeal, Third District,
California.

Dec. 15, 1930.

Rehearing Denied Jan. 14, 1931. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 9, 1931.

1. Automobiles ⇨171(2).

Term "public highways" in statute defining intersection must be read as referring to definition in statute defining public highways (St. 1923, pp. 519, 520, §§ 21, 23).

California Motor Vehicle Act, § 23 (St. 1923, p. 520), defined "intersection" as area embraced within prolongation of boundary or property lines of two or more public highways, and section 21 (St. 1923, p. 519) defined "public highway" as every highway, road, street, or alley dedicated to public, except such portions thereof as are used or prepared for use by pedestrians as sidewalks.

2. Statutes ⇨197.

Word "or" in statute defining intersection as prolongation of boundary "or" property lines is interpreted in ordinary or elementary sense as disjunctive particle indicating an alternative (St. 1923, p. 520, § 23).

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Or," see Words and Phrases.]

3. Automobiles ⇨171(2).

"Intersection" embraced within prolongation of boundary or property lines of highways held intended to include area devoted to vehicular traffic between curb lines only and not sidewalks (St. 1923, p. 520, § 23).

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Intersect; Intersection," see Words and Phrases.]

4. Automobiles ⇨246(9).

Requested instruction in action for injuries sustained in automobile collision at intersection enlarging intersections to include territory not available for vehicular traffic held properly refused (St. 1923, pp. 519, 520, §§ 21, 23, and p. 560, § 131, as amended by St. 1925, p. 412, § 15).

5. Trial ⇐256(10).

Appellant, if desiring more explicit instruction relative to intersections than reading of statute, should have requested correct instruction (St. 1923, p. 520, § 23).

6. Automobiles ⇐246(60).

Instruction that plaintiff motorist was presumed to have traveled at lawful speed in rightful place, and that presumption is evidence, held improper.

Instruction was improper where each party to automobile collision charged the other with negligence and the circumstances of the collision were fully testified to by eyewitnesses.

7. Automobiles ⇐245(1).

Where circumstances of automobile collision are fully testified to, jury should determine cause on testimony, not presumption that one party obeyed law.

8. Appeal and error ⇐1067.

Refusal to instruct that automobile collision raised no presumption that defendant was responsible was not prejudicial error, since applicable to both parties.

9. Automobiles ⇐245(14, 80).

Whether one or both drivers of automobiles colliding in daylight at intersection is negligent is for jury.

10. Appeal and error ⇐1068(3).

Error in instruction on presumption of care in automobile collision did not require reversal, where testimony showed defendant's responsibility.

11. Automobiles ⇐171(5).

That defendant motorist erred as to true boundary line of intersection would not relieve him from responsibility for collision with plaintiff having right of way (St. 1923, pp. 519, 520, §§ 21, 23, and p. 560, § 131, as amended by St. 1925, p. 412, § 15).

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Victor R. McLucas, Judge.

Action by W. O. Tyson against James R. C. Burton. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

H. T. Morrow and Henry L. Knoop, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

John A. Rush and John L. Rush, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

Mr. Justice PLUMMER delivered the opinion of the court.

The plaintiff had judgment in an action to recover damages for injuries suffered to his person, and also to his property, resulting from an automobile collision. From this judgment the defendant appeals.

The allegations of the complaint are that the injury to the plaintiff was caused solely by the negligence of the defendant. The answer denies the allegations of the complaint, and charges that any injury suffered by the plaintiff was due to his own negligence.

No issue is made as to the amount of damages awarded the plaintiff. The collision occurred at about 9:30 a. m., at the intersection of Vermont avenue and Los Feliz boulevard, in the city of Los Angeles. The plaintiff was driving in an easterly direction on Los Feliz boulevard, and the defendant was driving in a northerly direction on Vermont avenue. A map attached to the transcript and used as an exhibit upon the trial of this cause, and presented to this court as correctly delineating the point of impact of the two automobiles, indicates that the collision took place on Los Feliz boulevard at a point a trifle to the eastward from a line which would be coincident with the east curb line of Vermont avenue if extended northerly across Los Feliz boulevard. The car owned by the plaintiff, and which he was driving, was overturned at a point 72 feet from the east curb line of Vermont avenue, and at a place near the south curb line of Los Feliz boulevard. Los Feliz boulevard is 40 feet wide between the curb lines. Vermont avenue is 56 feet wide south of Los Feliz boulevard, and is divided by a parkway to the north of Los Feliz boulevard. The south property line of Los Feliz boulevard is 40 feet south of the south curb of that street. The west property line of Vermont avenue is 12 feet west of the west curb line of that avenue. Two questions are presented for consideration: The right of way of the respective drivers at the intersection of Los Feliz boulevard and Vermont avenue, depending upon whether section 23 of the California Motor Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 520) as it read at the time of the collision was intended to apply to and fix the intersection as being that portion of the respective streets which lay within the boundaries of the curb lines, or whether the intersection, as then defined by section 23 of the California Motor Vehicle Act, included the space within the property lines adjoining said intersection; and alleged errors on the part of the trial court in giving and refusing instructions.

[1] Section 23 of the California Motor Vehicle Act, as it read at the time of the collision which took place on January 19, 1926, in defining "intersection," read as follows: "The area embraced within the prolongation of the boundary or property lines of two or more public highways which join one another at an angle, whether or not one such public highway crosses the other." Section 131 of the Motor Vehicle Act, as amended by St. 1925, p. 412, § 15, as then in effect, relative to the right of way, so far as applicable here, read as follows: "When two vehicles approach an intersection of public highways at approximately the same time, the vehicle approaching from the right shall have the right of way, provided such vehicle is traveling at a lawful speed." The term "public highway," as defined in section 21 of the act (St. 1923, p. 519), reads: "Every highway, road, street, alley, * * * dedicated or abandoned to the public, or intended or used by or for the general public, except such portions thereof as are used or prepared for use by pedestrians as sidewalks," etc. Section 23 of said act, in the use of the term "public highways," must be read as referring to the definition of a public highway, as contained in section 21, and the right of way thereon must be determined by section 131. The court gave to the jury as an instruction section 23 of the California Motor Vehicle Act as it then read.

Upon this appeal, it is urgently insisted that the words "boundary" and "property," as used in section 23, are synonymous, and that the boundary of the intersection involved in this action must be read as though it included the space between the curb lines and the adjoining property lines, which would place the south boundary line of what is meant by section 23 as 40 feet south of the south line of Los Feliz boulevard and 12 feet west of the west curb line of Vermont avenue. This construction would give the right of way to an automobile traveling northward on Vermont avenue over an automobile traveling eastward on Los Feliz boulevard, provided it entered the area described as lying between the south curb line of Los Feliz boulevard and the line drawn coincident with the property line 40 feet south of the south line of Los Feliz boulevard, over an automobile entering the area described as lying between the west curb line of Vermont avenue and a line drawn parallel therewith and coincident to the property line 12 feet west of the west curb line of Vermont avenue; the contention of the appellant being that the automobile driven by him had entered this 40-foot area, or had crossed the line coincident with the property line south of Los Feliz boulevard before the plaintiff had crossed the 12-foot area west of the west curb line of Vermont avenue. This construction would give to the defendant 28 feet advantage in determining who had the right of way to cross the intersection of Vermont avenue and Los Feliz boulevard lying between the curb lines of the boulevard and the avenue.

[2] In support of their contentions, counsel have cited a long list of authorities where it has been necessary to interpret and give meaning to the use of the word "or" as it appears in statutes and contracts. A reference to "Words and Phrases," both to the first and third series, indicates that the meaning is given to that word according to the sense in which it is used, and as nearly as possible to effect the intent and purpose of the Legislature. Unless otherwise necessitated, the use of the word "or" is interpreted in its ordinary or elementary sense, which, as stated in Pompano Horse Club v. State, 93 Fla. 415, 111 So. 801, 52 A. L. R. 51, is as follows: "In its elementary sense, the word 'or' is a disjunctive particle indicating an alternative. It often connects a series of words or propositions, presenting a choice of either." We find also, in "Words and Phrases," that the word "or" is sometimes used as a conjunctive as well as a disjunctive, and that the word "or" is frequently used interchangeably with the word "and," and, if it becomes necessary to correctly interpret and apply the meaning of the Legislature, the word "and" will be read in place of the word "or." See 5 Words and Phrases, Third Series, p. 654 et seq.

[3] To properly interpret the use of the words which we are considering, we must first ascertain the intent actuating the Legislature. By reading sections 21, 23, and 131 together, it is evident that the Legislature had in mind the purpose of setting forth a rule of law which would define the right of way to automobile drivers about to use the public highway as defined by section 21; that is, the portions thereof as are used by vehicles as contradistinguished from other portions used by pedestrians, or reserved for sidewalk or other kindred purposes; and that the location of the property line outside of the area devoted to vehicular traffic was not intended to be included within a street or highway intersection. That the Legislature intended to, and the language of the sections considered, include only the area bounded by the curb lines of the streets involved, where the intersection of the public highway chances to be a city street, is further supported by the fact that outside of incorporated cities the boundary or exterior lines of public highways are almost universally coincident with adjoining property lines, thus in both cases enforcing the idea that the portion of the public highway, whether outside or inside incorporated cities, when intersections are mentioned, refers to and means only that area available for vehicular traffic.

[4] This interpretation fully answers the contention of the appellant that the court erred in refusing requested instructions which would enlarge the area of street intersections so as to include considerable territory not available for use by vehicular traffic. The interpretation which we think is the common sense view of the sections considered also determines the right of way between the parties to this action. This is shown by the testimony of the defendant himself, only one sentence of which we need to here set forth, to wit: "Assuming that the intersection on the south side is marked by the property line prolonged by Vermont avenue, and on the west by the property line prolonged across Los Feliz, I was in the intersection long before Mr. Tyson, to my recollection." As we have heretofore shown, the area in which the defendant placed himself and his automobile began at a line 40 feet south of Los Feliz boulevard, and within which territory he may have been, as testified by himself, and yet the right of way would unquestionably belong to the plaintiff Tyson, if the automobile driven by him were nearer the intersection than the distance within the 40-foot area claimed by the appellant as marking the line where their respective rights began. All the credible testimony in the case is to the effect that the plaintiff was nearer the intersection than the defendant, and actually entered the intersection, as we have defined it, before the defendant did so. We say "credible testimony" because the testimony of the one witness for the defendant, when analyzed, shows a complete misconception of both time and distance.

[5] It may be further said that, if the appellant desired a more explicit instruction be given to the jury, relative to intersections, than the reading of section 23 of the California Motor Vehicle Act, it was appellant's duty to ask for a correct instruction more fully defining the area included within the term "intersection," and not to rest his case upon the requesting of instructions manifestly erroneous.

[6] It is further insisted that the court erred in giving to the jury an instruction in these words: "You are instructed that the presumption is that every man obeys the law, and the presumption in this case is that the plaintiff was traveling at a lawful rate of speed and in his rightful place. This presumption is in itself a species of evidence, and it shall be considered by you in your deliberations." This instruction was given to the jury on the theory that certain subdivisions of section 1963 of the Code of Civil Procedure warrant the application of the presumptions there mentioned. Just how this instruction can be considered proper, where each party to an automobile collision charges the other with the sole negligence which resulted in the collision, and the circumstances attending the collision are fully testified to by the respective parties and also by eyewitnesses, does not clearly appear. It would seem that both parties would be equally entitled to the presumption of taking ordinary care for his own welfare, and also that he was obeying the law. In support of the instruction, however, we are cited to the case of Olsen v. Standard Oil Co., 188 Cal. 20, 204 P. 393, 395, where a somewhat similar instruction was given to the jury reading as follows: "The presumption is that every man obeys the law and the presumption in this case is that the plaintiff was traveling at a lawful rate of speed and on the proper side of the highway at all times. This presumption is in itself a species of evidence and it shall prevail and control your deliberations until and unless it is overcome by satisfactory evidence." At first reading it might seem that the approval of the instruction which we have just quoted is conclusive in favor of the instruction involved in the instant case. A closer inspection of the instruction given in the Olsen Case, and relied upon by the respondent in support of the instruction given in the instant case, shows that the two instructions are readily distinguishable. In the instant case no limitation is placed upon the instruction, and the presumption was not only declared to be a species of evidence, but was to be considered by the jury at all times in its deliberations, and in that particular differs very materially from the limitation placed upon the instruction in the Olsen Case. There it is said: "This presumption is in itself a species of evidence, and it shall prevail and control your deliberations until, and unless it is overcome by satisfactory evidence." It may be further observed that the opinion in the Olsen Case does not cite or analyze any former cases where a like presumption has been held applicable to instances where all the parties are alive and the circumstances are fully testified to by them and by eyewitnesses. The cases which have been called to our attention, and which we have been able to discover where the presumption as to taking care of one's self and obeying the law, relate to instances where one of the parties is deceased. As said in Gorman v. County of Sacramento, 92 Cal. App. 656, 268 P. 1083, 1085: "There is also another well-recognized rule of law applying to accidents like the one in the case at bar, to wit, that deceased is presumed to have exercised ordinary care for his own safety." This rule is fully and fairly stated by Mr. Justice Henshaw in the case of Crabbe v. Mammoth Channel G. M. Co., 168 Cal. 500, 143 P. 714, 716, as follows: "Where death is occasioned under circumstances such as this, without eyewitnesses, the law comes to the aid of the plaintiff who is pressing a suit for damages for the death, and that law is found in the presumption of the Code of Civil Procedure, namely, that a person takes ordinary care of his own concerns. Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 4. * * * This is a controvertible presumption, it is true, but until controverted it is evidence in accordance with which the jury is bound to decide"—citing Boyle v. Coast Imp. Co., 27 Cal. App. 714, 151 P. 25; Kreitzer v. Southern Pacific Co., 38 Cal. App. 654, 177 P. 477. And as said in the leading case of Larrabee v. Western Pac. Ry. Co., 173

Cal. 743, 161 P. 750, 751: "But, touching the presumption that the deceased exercised ordinary care, it is to be noted that that presumption is given weight only in the absence of evidence on the subject of the deceased's conduct. It has been declared to be 'an artificial presumption of so weak a character that it is not to be allowed to have the effect of evidence before the jury where the uncontradicted evidence of the circumstances attending the accident overthrows it.'" A large number of cases are cited in this opinion.

A well-considered opinion citing authorities on the subject of the application of the presumption that a party takes due care of his own welfare is to be found in the case of Ross v. Railways Co., 47 Cal. App. 753, 191 P. 703. It is there held that the presumption is applicable where one party is deceased, and the death of the party alleged to be due to the negligence against whom the action is prosecuted where there were no eyewitnesses to testify to facts controverting the presumption. To the same effect is the case of Hatzakorzian v. Rucker-Fuller Desk Co., 197 Cal. 82, 239 P. 709, 41 A. L. R. 1027. In that case there was no testimony as to the conduct of the defendant, and the presumption of due care was allowed to support the judgment. See, also, Blackwell v. American Film Co., 189 Cal. 689, 209 P. 999; Carpenter v. A. T. & S. F. Ry. Co., 51 Cal. App. 60, 195 P. 1073.

In the case of Ryan v. Union Ry. Co., 46 Utah, 530, 151 P. 71, 74, the Supreme Court of Utah, considering the question of presumptions, held as follows: "In the absence of evidence there is a presumption that the deceased used due care and, for his protection, did all that reasonably was required of him. * * * When, however, facts and circumstances are proven to show just what the deceased did, or failed to do, then his care, or the want of it, is to be determined not on the presumption, but upon the facts and circumstances proven."

It is further held that, where all the facts and circumstances were proven, the court is not authorized to cast a presumption into the scales in favor of the plaintiff.

In the case of Osterholm v. Butte Electric Ry. Co., 60 Mont. 193, 199 P. 252, 255, the Supreme Court of Montana thus speaks of the presumption we are considering: "This statute, however, applies to a defendant as well as to a plaintiff, and one of the questions at issue here is whether the proper kind of care was used. The plaintiff charges negligence on the part of the defendants; the defendants charge negligence on the part of the plaintiff. The court has no more right to presume that the deceased used ordinary care than it has to presume that the defendants used ordinary care. This is one of the questions of fact at issue."

[7] A number of the decisions are to the effect that the presumption is not to be considered evidence in any case, but, irrespective of those decisions, the overwhelming weight of authorities, as shown by the long list of cases cited in appellant's brief, is to the effect that, where all the circumstances attending the collision of two automobiles is fully testified to by eyewitnesses, including the testimony of the parties themselves, the cause is to be determined by the jury upon the facts and circumstances testified to, and not upon a presumption that one of the parties obeyed the law, and that the other party did not.

Our attention is also called to the recent case of Western & Atlantic Railroad v. Mary E. Henderson and Maryland Casualty Co., decided May 27, 1929, 279 U. S. 639, 49 S. Ct. 445, 447, 73 L. Ed. 884, where the United States Supreme Court has held that a Georgia statute declaring that a railroad company shall be liable for damages to person or property, by the running of its trains, unless the company shall make it appear that their agents have exercised all reasonable or ordinary care and diligence, the presumption in all cases being against the company, to be violative of the Fourteenth Amendment of the United States Constitution. The action was prosecuted to recover damages for a death occurring at a grade crossing on a public highway, the appellee's husband, the driver of a motortruck, having been killed in a collision between the motortruck which he was driving and a train operated by the company. In considering the question of the presumption, the Supreme Court said: "Upon the mere fact of collision and resulting death, the statute is held to raise a presumption that defendant and its employees were negligent in each of the particulars alleged, and that every act or omission in plaintiff's specifications of negligence was the proximate cause of the death, and it makes defendant liable unless it showed due care in respect of every matter alleged against it. And, by authorizing the jury, in the absence of evidence, to find negligence in the operation of the engine and train, the court necessarily permitted the presumption to be considered and weighed as evidence against the testimony of defendant's witnesses tending affirmatively to prove such operation was not negligent in any respect." The court further held that the mere fact of the collision between the railway train and vehicle at a highway crossing furnishes no basis for any inference as to whether the accident was caused by the negligence of the railway company or the traveler on the highway, or of both, or without fault of any one. It was further held that the presumption provided for in that case was unconstitutional, in that it violated the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The presumption provided for in the Georgia statute, to be indulged in against the defendant in the event of a collision, is the counterpart of the presumption awarded to the plaintiff in the instant case, in determining who was at fault.

[8, 9] It is further contended on the part of the appellant that the court erred in refusing to give to the jury the following requested instruction: "You are instructed that the mere fact, alone, that there was a collision between defendant's automobile and plaintiff's automobile, raises no presumption at all that the defendant was in any way responsible for such occurrence." While the language of this requested instruction may be a correct statement of the law, it is apparent that it sets forth only a principle that is applicable to both parties. As a matter of common knowledge, the conclusion is unescapable that where two automobiles collide in broad daylight, upon an open intersection, one or the other of the drivers is negligent, and possibly both, and the question as to which driver is negligent should be left for the jury to determine upon the facts and circumstances testified to by the eyewitnesses and the parties involved.

[10, 11] What we have said herein, however, does not necessitate a reversal of the judgment. The testimony is overwhelming that the defendant in this case is and was responsible for the injuries resulting from the collision. The testimony is all to the effect that the automobile driven by the plaintiff was within the intersection before the entry thereof by the defendant, and, as we have said, the testimony of the defendant himself practically admits this contention. The fact that he was in error as to the true boundary line of the intersection does not relieve him from responsibility, and, even though it be held that under the circumstances of this case the giving of the challenged instructions was improper, there has been no miscarriage of justice, as the jury could not very well have brought in any other verdict.

The judgment is affirmed.

KELLETT v. KELLETT.

Civ. 7581.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 2, California.

Dec. 29, 1930.

1. Divorce ⇨161.

Refusing plaintiff additional time to file affidavits to support motion to vacate interlocutory divorce decree and to rebut defendant's counter affidavit held not abuse of discretion under circumstances (Code Civ. Proc. § 2044).

The circumstances disclosed that while the defendant's counter affidavit was not filed until time set for hearing, it had been served on plaintiff's counsel two days before the hearing and that the hearing was continued from 10 o'clock in the morning until 2 in the afternoon at plaintiff's request, at which time affidavits were filed by plaintiff, and that the additional affidavits were desired to support plaintiff's affidavits rather than to rebut defendant's counter affidavit.

2. Divorce ⇨161.

Defaulting defendant has such standing in court as entitles him to insist on integrity of interlocutory divorce decree (Civ. Code, § 131).

3. Divorce ⇨161.

Defaulting defendant may introduce evidence to show that interlocutory divorce decree should not be vacated (Civ. Code, § 131).

4. Divorce ⇨184(6).

Court's decision that interlocutory divorce decree should not be disturbed, based on conflicting evidence in affidavit form, could not be disturbed on appeal.

5. Divorce ⇨161.

Court cannot set aside property settlement executed by parties to divorce action on motion to vacate interlocutory decree.

6. Judgment ⇨382.

Plaintiff, obtaining judgment for all relief possible under complaint, could not have judgment set aside under statute by reason of mistake or excusable neglect (Code Civ. Proc. § 473).

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, courts may relieve party from judgment taken against him through his mistake, inadvertence, or excusable neglect, but are not authorized to relieve party from judgment in his favor.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Clair S. Tappaan, Judge.

Action by Marion Clara Kellett against Thomas N. Kellett. The plaintiff obtained an interlocutory divorce decree. From an order denying a motion to set aside the interlocutory decree and contract of property settlement, the plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Betty Graydon, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Wm. M. Morse, Jr., of Los Angeles, for respondent.

ARCHBALD, Justice pro tem.

This is an appeal from an order of the trial court denying a motion made by appellant, as plaintiff in such court, under section 473, Code of Civil Procedure, for an order setting aside the interlocutory decree of divorce entered in her favor, and also to set aside a contract of property settlement between the parties and two deeds executed at the same time in connection with the property settlement, and to reopen the cause for further hearing.

The record shows that appellant filed her complaint for divorce in the superior court of Los Angeles county on July 29, 1927; that the default of respondent was entered therein August 10, 1927; and that an interlocutory decree in favor of appellant thereupon issued. On motion of appellant's attorney the case was thereafter reopened to prove a property settlement between the parties, and the decree as amended awarded the real property mentioned in the settlement to respondent, certain personal property to appellant as well as the sum of $2,400, to be paid in monthly installments, and created a lien on the real property described to secure the payment of said sum. Thereafter and within the six months' period appellant filed her motion under section 473, Code of Civil Procedure, for the order first mentioned and attached to it her supporting affidavit. For the purpose of this appeal it is sufficient to say that the affidavit states that the defendant, about a month after the marriage, commenced treating the plaintiff unkindly and persisted in such course of conduct for a period of about six months, when he abandoned her and went to live with his sister, leaving plaintiff without means of support; that the latter filed suit for separate maintenance against defendant and about two months later he came back to her, said he was in the wrong and sorry and asked her to take him back, promising that he would conduct himself as he should and would convey to her one-half of his property; that plaintiff was anxious for a reconciliation, accepted his promises, effected a reconciliation, and that defendant conveyed to her a one-half interest in his two pieces of real estate; that they lived happily together for three or four months, when defendant again resumed his unkind conduct and former accusations that she married him for his property; that he kept that up for about a year, and as a result plaintiff became physically weak and mentally incapable of resisting his "persistent requests and demands that she reconvey said property to him"; that finally she told him that she did not marry him for his property and would do anything he wanted her to do to prove it; that he then said that if "she would reconvey to him said property that it would satisfy him that she had not married him for his property alone"; that he promised her "that if she would make said conveyance to demonstrate her love for him he would again reconvey the said property to her after he was convinced of her love"; that he employed his own attorney and told her to go to him; that he instructed the attorney to prepare deeds and a property settlement contract which she signed solely "to demonstrate to the defendant that she really loved him and relied on his promise that he would reconvey said property to her and that they would thereafter live happily together"; that after the execution of said deeds and contract the defendant suggested to her that she should get a divorce from him, and then talked over the matter of a divorce with said attorney; that thereupon she told defendant she did not want a divorce "and that they had not talked that matter over," and she refused to do so; that defendant said she must get a divorce from him, "that there must be a divorce in order for the property settlement to be good," and that "she could only prove her love by getting a divorce from him"; that he would "later on remarry her and redeed said property to her if he was entirely convinced that she had not married him for his property"; that she could only convince him by getting a divorce; that she informed him she would do anything to satisfy him of her love, and at his direction went to the same attorney whom defendant had employed and caused the divorce action to be filed; that after it was filed she told him she did not want to go ahead with it, but he told her she must and resorted "to threats and violent methods" in order to intimidate and coerce her into complying with his said demands; that since the rendition of said decree of divorce she has become convinced that all of defendant's representations were false and fraudulent and made for the "purpose of reacquiring said property."

On the day the motion in question was heard, April 23, 1928, defendant filed a counter affidavit denying the serious statements contained in plaintiff's affidavit and placing a version on some of the incidents alleged in the affidavit quite inconsistent therewith. The counter affidavit was served on opposing counsel on April 21, 1928. It also appears from the records of the case that the motion was called at 10 a. m. on April 23d, at which time plaintiff's counsel stated that they had not had time to file affidavits in opposition to defendant's counter affidavit and asked the court for time in which to do so; that thereupon the court continued the hearing of said motion to 2 o'clock p. m. of the same day and at the further hearing allowed plaintiff, over defendant's objection, to file the affidavit of Mrs. Clara Bailey, the mother of plaintiff; that plaintiff then requested time to prepare and file further affidavits of witnesses "in support of plaintiff's motion and in opposition to defendant's affidavit," which request the court denied, proceeding to hear arguments of counsel and rendering its decision denying said motion on said day. Notice of appeal was filed May 7, 1928.

There is no question but that it is the policy of the law to guard against collusion and fraud in divorce cases and that it should be its aim to afford the fullest possible hearing in such matters (McBlain v. McBlain, 77 Cal. 507, 20 P. 61), and it is appellant's contention that the court erred in denying her request for time to file further affidavits and her motion for leave to bring in witnesses to testify in open court.

[1] While it was not filed until the time set for the hearing, the counter affidavit of defendant was served on counsel for plaintiff two days before the hearing, and the hearing was continued from 10 o'clock in the morning until 2 o'clock in the afternoon at plaintiff's request, at which time the court permitted the affidavit of Mrs. Bailey to be filed by plaintiff. The contents of this affidavit, however, are more in corroboration of the affidavit of plaintiff than in rebuttal of that of defendant; and the record seems to indicate that the additional affidavits were desired to support plaintiff's affidavits rather than to rebut the counter affidavit of defendant, which for the most part consists of denials only, the few affirmative allegations, with the exception of the statement of an occurrence in the attorney's office, being statements of matters of conversation between the parties themselves. We see no abuse of discretion in not allowing more time than was given to file counter affidavits. As to additional affidavits "to support" that of plaintiff, they would seem to be cumulative and within the discretionary power of the court to limit. Section 2044, Code Civ. Proc.; Estate of Wineteer, 176 Cal. 28, 167 P. 516.

[2-4] Counsel who filed the opening brief for appellant on this appeal seem to urge that there was error in denying the motion because it was based on an affidavit setting up collusion and fraud. Section 131 of the Civil Code, referring to divorce proceedings, among other things provides: "After the entry of the interlocutory judgment, neither party shall have the right to dismiss the action without the consent of the other." And a defaulting defendant has such standing as entitles him to insist on the integrity of the interlocutory decree. Suttman v. Superior Court, 174 Cal. 243, 162 P. 1032. That means necessarily that he may introduce evidence to show that it should not be vacated when, after notice, the validity of the decree is attacked. Respondent did so in this case, and the court having decided the question on extremely conflicting evidence, we are not authorized to interfere with its decision even though the evidence is in affidavit form. Kataoka v. Hanselman, 150 Cal. 673, 89 P. 1082; Doak v. Bruson, 152 Cal. 17, 91 P. 1001. And that would seem to be true regardless of the grounds alleged.

[5] It is hardly necessary to say that the court cannot set aside contracts such as deeds and property settlements executed by the parties to an action, on a motion. A plenary action is required for that purpose.

[6] Appellant based her right to the relief asked on section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, by reason "of a mistake, excusable neglect and fraud, coercion and undue influence practiced upon her by the defendant," as shown by her affidavit. Such section provides that "the court * * * may, also, upon such terms as may be just, relieve a party or his legal representative from a judgment, order, or other proceeding taken against him through his mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect; provided, that application therefor be made within a reasonable time, but in no case exceeding six months after such judgment, order, or proceeding was taken; and provided, further, that said application must be accompanied with a copy of the answer, or other pleading proposed to be filed therein, otherwise said application shall not be granted." (Italics ours.) The motion was filed in time, but the judgment which appellant asks to set aside is one in her favor and not against her, as the section provides, and no copy of any pleading accompanied the application, nor could it, as appellant apparently desires to have the interlocutory decree set aside so that she can dismiss the action or at least not have a judgment in her favor, as her affidavit impeaches her action in filing the complaint. By the judgment which she seeks to set aside she obtained all the relief possible under her complaint, and it is that she is objecting to. She says she did not want a divorce but was forced into it by her husband, against whom the judgment ran. She might be entitled to relief by a plenary action if she could convince a court of equity that she came into the court with clean hands, but she certainly shows nothing that brings her within the section upon which she relied in the instant case. Her affidavit does not show mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect, but fraud, and would not seem to make out a case to which the section applies even if the judgment were not in her favor but against her.

It was the duty of the court, inasmuch as the affidavit filed by appellant showed collusion, to make such inquiry as was necessary to satisfy it that there was no imposition, which was undoubtedly done. But even if the evidence produced had convinced the judge that collusion was involved, it would have been necessary, in our opinion, to deny appellant's motion and on the court's own motion to have set aside the decree. Evidently the court did not conclude from the evidence that such should be done, and we can see no error in the denying of appellant's motion for relief.

It is only fair to present counsel for appellant to say that she did not come into the case until the matter had already been submitted on appeal, and then only for the purpose of endeavoring to reopen the proceeding.

Judgment affirmed.

CARY, P. J.

This action was brought by plaintiff to recover damages for injuries received in a collision between plaintiff's automobile and defendant's truck. From a judgment entered upon a verdict in favor of plaintiff Gonzalez and against defendant, defendant appeals.

As grounds for reversal the defendant contends: (1) That the evidence fails to establish negligence; (2) that the evidence shows contributory negligence as a matter of law; (3) that the court erroneously admitted certain evidence; (4) that the court erred in giving and refusing certain instructions; and (5) that the court erred in permitting certain questions to be asked on the examination of the jurors.

Viewed in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, the facts follow: The accident took place between 1 and 2 o'clock in the morning on the main highway leading from Imperial Valley north to the city of Riverside, at a point some 8 or 10 miles south of the station of Whitewater. The road is paved, and on either side of the pavement are shoulders of hard-packed sand sufficiently wide to allow a vehicle such as defendant's truck to be parked thereon. There are several storm drains or dips in the road in this vicinity, and in the bottom of one of these a large truck belonging to the defendant was standing close to its right edge of the pavement and headed towards Riverside. All of its wheels were on the pavement. Two employees of the defendant, assisted by two other men, were engaged in replacing on the truck a load of baled alfalfa which had previously fallen off. Some of these bales had already been loaded on the truck while others were scattered along the roadway, some of them on the pavement in rear of the truck. The truck had a lighted tail-light located two inches underneath and some three feet forward of the rear end of the bed of the truck. The plaintiff with a single passenger in his automobile was driving north along this highway. The night was unusually dark. The lighted headlights and the brakes on the plaintiff's machine were in good condition and he was watching the road ahead. Driving at from 30 to 35 miles an hour plaintiff, due to the combination of the dip in the road, the bales of hay in rear of the truck, the position of the truck's tail-light underneath the bed of the truck, and the headlights of a car coming from the opposite direction, did not see the truck until he was within 15 or 20 feet of it. The car coming in the opposite direction was just passing the truck, making it impossible for plaintiff to swing to his left. Plaintiff immediately slammed on his brakes with such force that his passenger was hurled forward against the windshield with sufficient force to break the glass. The right front fender of plaintiff's automobile collided with the left rear portion of defendant's truck with the result that plaintiff's machine was severely damaged and the plaintiff seriously injured. Evidence was introduced on behalf of the plaintiff without objection that the driver of the truck had, after the accident, stated that he saw plaintiff's headlights and tried to get out a flashlight and signal him, but was unable to do so on account of his nervousness and excitement.

[1, 2] Under these circumstances the question of the negligence of the defendant was properly submitted to the jury, nor can it be said as a matter of law that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence in failing to discern the truck sooner.

[3] Defendant complains that the court, over objection, allowed plaintiff's physician to state that plaintiff had told him another physician had removed a piece of glass from plaintiff's arm. We fail to see how prejudice could have resulted therefrom.

On cross-examination of defendant's truck driver he was asked the question: "Did you state in substance at that conversation that you had been working about 18 or 20 hours for Mr. Nichols on the day immediately, and the time immediately preceding the collision, and that you were tired out, so tired that you were unable to drive any more and had turned the truck over to Mr. Hedgpeth, whom you regarded as an incompetent driver?" A. "I do not remember of making it." Upon rebuttal plaintiff was asked the question: "State the substance of that conversation if you remember it." Over objection plaintiff replied: "He said, 'I have been on the road over 24 hours and I was too tired, and if my helper was incompetent enough to drive the truck, and the helper had been driving before, on the last load.'"

[4] While the proper question to have asked plaintiff on rebuttal would have been whether or not at the stated time and place and in the presence of the stated witnesses the truck driver had made the statement asked in the cross-examination, quoting it, and while this method was not pursued, yet the error cannot be considered prejudicial for two reasons: First, the answer is so incoherent that it is impossible to tell what it means, and, second, even if we should assume that the answer meant that the truck driver had turned the truck over to his assistant, whom he regarded as an incompetent driver, yet whether the truck driver's assistant was competent or incompetent to drive the truck could in no wise have prejudiced the defendant, since the truck was stationary at the time of the accident.

Several other assignments of error of similar nature are made. These we have carefully examined, but find nothing prejudicial. We find no error in the court's rulings on the examination of the jurors.

[5, 6] Defendant complains of the giving and refusing of certain instructions, but the only one which requires special notice is the following: "The court further instructs you that the plaintiff is not required to show particularly what the specific act of negligence was which produced the accident, but is only required to show that the collision is one which would not ordinarily occur had due care been employed by the defendants. The burden of proof then shifts to the defendants to show their freedom from negligence." The theory under which this instruction was given is not clear. It is apparently an attempt to state the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur, and plaintiff, in support of this instruction, cites Soto v. Spring Valley Water Co., 39 Cal. App. 187, 178 P. 305, where a similar instruction was approved. That case was one in which the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur was applicable. But under the circumstances in the case at bar that doctrine has no application. The giving of this instruction was therefore error. It remains to be determined whether this error is sufficient to require a reversal of the cause. Elsewhere in the instructions the jury were repeatedly told that the burden was on the plaintiff to prove by a preponderance of the evidence that the negligence of the defendant was the proximate cause of the injury. In Tower v. Humboldt Transit Co., 176 Cal. 602, 169 P. 227, an instruction on the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur was held erroneous because not applicable to the facts. While the Supreme Court reversed the case because of that and other instructions, yet the court pointed out that the proof of negligence in that particular case was so unsatisfactory that the errors in instructions could not be disregarded under the provisions of section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution. Here, however, an exceptionally clear case of negligence is presented. We are therefore of the opinion that the giving of this instruction cannot be said to have resulted in a miscarriage of justice.

The judgment is affirmed.

CITY OF LOS ANGELES v. OLIVER et al.
Civ. 7216.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 2, California.

Dec. 5, 1930.

Rehearing Denied Dec. 30, 1930. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 2, 1931.

1. Eminent domain ⇨262(5).

That affidavit, basis of order to show cause why order should not be made giving city immediate possession of land condemned, did not show costs had been deposited, held not prejudicial, where costs were deposited before motion to quash was heard.

2. Eminent domain ⇨244.

"Judgment" referred to in statute regarding taking possession of condemned land is judgment awarding damages and not final judgment condemning land (Code Civ. Proc. § 1254; St. 1903, p. 385, § 31, and section 12 [page 379], as amended by St. 1909, p. 1040, § 7).

Code Civ. Proc. § 1254, provides that, whenever plaintiff shall have paid into court for defendant full amount of "judgment," Superior Court in which proceeding was tried may authorize plaintiff, if already in possession, to continue therein, and, if not, to take possession of and use property during pendency of and until final conclusion of litigation.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Judgment," see Words and Phrases.]

3. Eminent domain ⇨244.

Interlocutory judgment in condemnation proceeding awarding damages is "final judgment," warranting order for immediate possession (St. 1903, p. 379, § 12, as amended by St. 1909, p. 1040, § 7; Code Civ. Proc. § 1254).

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Final Decree or Judgment," see Words and Phrases.]

4. Eminent domain ⇨247(1).

Statute providing for interest on damages awarded, where order is made letting condemnor into possession, is inapplicable under present statute (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1249, 1254).

Code Civ. Proc. § 1249, provides that, if order is made letting plaintiff into possession as provided in section 1254, compensation and damages awarded shall draw lawful interest from date of such order. Such provision is, however, held not to apply to section 1254 as it now exists.

5. Eminent domain ⇨247(4).

City's payment into court of amount of interlocutory judgment in condemnation proceedings was equivalent to tender and stopped running of interest (St. 1903, p. 385, § 31).

The condemnation proceedings were brought under Street Opening Act of 1903, St. 1903, p. 385, section 31 of which provides that, as soon as there is sufficient money in hands of city treasurer in fund devoted to proposed improvement to pay, amount awarded defendant by interlocutory judgment shall be paid to parties entitled or into court for their benefit. As soon as city had sufficient money on hand, award was paid into court.

6. Eminent domain ⇨244.

Where order is made in condemnation proceedings letting plaintiff into immediate possession, requirement of deposit of sum, in addition to amount of judgment, is in discretion of court (Code Civ. Proc. § 1254).

7. Eminent domain ⇨244.

Refusal to fix further sum, in addition to damages awarded on letting condemnor into immediate possession, being discretionary and based on conflicting evidence, would not be disturbed by appellate court.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walter S. Gates, Judge.

Action by the City of Los Angeles against J. G. Oliver, Leonard J. Woodruff, and others. From the judgment, defendant Woodruff appeals.

Affirmed.

J. A. Coleman and Ed. Fitzpatrick, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Erwin P. Werner, City Atty., Arthur Loveland, Arthur W. Nordstrom, and Frederick Von Schrader, Deputy City Attys., all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

ARCHBALD, Justice pro tem.

This is an appeal by Leonard J. Woodruff from an order made by the honorable Walter

S. Gates, judge of the Superior Court in and for Los Angeles county, giving respondent immediate possession and use of the real property belonging to appellant, described in said order.

Appellant was one of the defendants in an action brought by the city of Los Angeles to condemn for street purposes a portion of a lot belonging to him, as well as property of the other defendants. The defendant Woodruff waived a jury trial, and the hearing before referees appointed in said action was held in September, 1927. On April 12, 1928, the referees returned and filed their report, fixing the value of the land to be taken from appellant at $162,496, and his damages at $16,000, or a total damage of $178,496. The damages were fixed as of the date of the issuance of the summons, August 6, 1926. The report came on for hearing before the honorable Hartley Shaw, a judge of said Superior Court, on the 16th day of July, 1928, on the objections and exceptions filed thereto by the appellant herein, at which hearing witnesses were examined on behalf of both respondent and appellant, and on November 28, 1928, said judge made his findings of fact and conclusions of law, to the effect that the value of the land taken and severance damages were as found by the report of the referees; that the use to which said property sought to be condemned was to be applied was one authorized by law; that the acquisition thereof was necessary to such use; and that upon payment of said sum so awarded to the defendant or into court for his benefit, together with costs of suit, the plaintiff should be entitled to a decree condemning such land to the use of the plaintiff and the public for the widening of Cahuenga boulevard. A judgment based on such findings and conclusions was also signed the same day, to the effect that, upon payment to the several defendants or into court for their benefit severally of the amounts awarded them, the land sought to be condemned should be condemned for the use of said city and the public for such purposes, which judgment fixed appellant's costs at $21.50. An appeal was taken from said judgment by the defendant Woodruff, appellant here, which was decided by this court on December 3, 1929 (102 Cal. App. 299, 283 P. 298). It was appellant's contention on such appeal that the 1927 amendment of section 10 of the Street Opening Act of 1903 (St. 1903, p. 379, § 10, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1146, § 8) did not apply to pending actions, and that the damages should have been based on the value of the property at the time of trial instead of the date of the issuance of the summons. While that appeal was pending, the city of Los Angeles filed an affidavit in said action for an order directing the defendant Woodruff to show cause before said court why an order should not be made giving the city immediate possession of the land of defendant described in said findings and interlocutory judgment, reciting that the amount fixed as compensation, $178,496, was paid into court on August 17, 1929. Defendant Woodruff appeared in opposition thereto, and filed a motion to quash said order to show cause and an affidavit by one R. E. Bonsall, which stated that he had resided in Hollywood for eight years, and that during such time was dealing in real estate, specializing in Hollywood boulevard business property, particularly from Vine street on the east to La Brea on the west; that appellant's property is on the south side of Hollywood boulevard one block west of Vine street; that for eight years he as a realty salesman had made investigation and inquiry as to sales, leases, and transactions concerning real property in the vicinity of that of defendants, and that the reasonable market value of defendant's property per front foot was as follows: July 30, 1927, $7,500; September 28, 1927, $7,500; July 16, 1928, $8,000; and August 6, 1928, $6,000. The width of defendant's property so sought to be taken was 40 feet. The hearing on said order to show cause was argued before Judge Gates on December 6, 1929, at which time both sides stipulated that the amount of the judgment, together with the costs, had been paid into court by plaintiff for the benefit of the defendant Woodruff, and on January 3, 1930, an order was made by Judge Gates granting immediate possession and use of the property of the defendant described in the complaint to the city of Los Angeles.

Appellant contends that the lower court erred (1) in overruling appellant's motion to quash said order to show cause and (2) in making the order for immediate use and possession of said land, and in refusing to fix a sum as a fund to pay further damages and costs.

[1] (1) Counsel for appellant urge that, inasmuch as the affidavit on which the order to show cause was based did not show that the costs of $21.50 had been deposited, the motion to quash should have been granted. The record shows that the costs were deposited before the motion was heard, and consequently there would not seem to be any merit in the contention or any prejudice resulting to defendant.

(2) Appellant under his second contention urges that the order for immediate possession should not have been made (a) because there was no final judgment entered in the case as provided by section 31 of the 1903 Street Opening Act (St. 1903, p. 385), nor any final order condemning the land at the time the order was made, (b) because at such time full compensation had not been deposited in court, for the reason that no interest had been paid on the interlocutory judgment, and, (c) because the order did not provide a fund to insure the payment of any further damages and costs that might be awarded.

(a) Appellant contends that there should have been a final judgment under section 31 of the Street Opening Act of 1903. Section 12 of such act (St. 1903, p. 379, as amended by St. 1909, p. 1040, § 7), provides: "Upon the confirmation of the report of the referees, or receipt of the verdict of the jury, or the filing of the findings of the court, the court shall make and enter an interlocutory judgment in accordance with such report, verdict or findings, adjudging that upon payment to the respective parties, or into court for their benefit, of the several amounts found due them as compensation, and of the costs allowed to them, the property involved in the action shall be condemned to the use of the plaintiff, and dedicated to the use specified in the complaint." Section 31 provides: "* * * On satisfactory proof being made to the court of payment of the amounts awarded by the interlocutory judgment to the respective parties entitled thereto, or into court for their benefit, it shall direct the interlocutory judgment to be satisfied, and shall make and enter a final judgment, condemning the lands described in the complaint to the use of the plaintiff for the purposes specified in such complaint."

[2, 3] The provisions of section 12 have been strictly followed in the instant case. An appeal was taken from the interlocutory judgment rendered, and the proceedings for the order for possession under section 1254 of the Code of Civil Procedure were taken while such appeal was pending. It is very evident from a reading of section 1254 that the judgment referred to there is the judgment referred to in section 12 of the Street Opening Act awarding damages to the plaintiff, and not the final judgment condemning the land. The language of section 1254 is so clear that it is doubtful if appellant would have made this contention if it were not for certain language appearing in the case of County of San Mateo v. Coburn, 130 Cal. 631, 637, 63 P. 78, 80, 621, where the court says: "A final decree of condemnation can be made only after full compensation has been made to the owner, or ascertained and paid into court for him; and, as the order for possession pending the appeal must have this final decree for its foundation, it must fall with the reversal of the decree." (Italics ours.) In that case the court reversed the judgment entered below condemning the land and used the language quoted. The case is to be distinguished, we believe, in view of the fact that section 1254 of the Code of Civil Procedure as it existed then is not the one in force now, and, as a matter of fact, the section then in force was afterwards held unconstitutional by the Supreme Court. Steinhart v. Superior Court, 137 Cal. 575, 70 P. 629, 59 L. R. A. 404, 92 Am. St. Rep. 183. The present section was enacted in 1903, after such decision.

There can be no question but that the interlocutory judgment, so called, is a final judgment. The Supreme Court, in the case of California Southern R. R. Co. v. Southern Pacific R. R. Co., 67 Cal. 59, at page 63, 7 P. 123, 126, uses the following language as to such a judgment: "The judgment based in part on the assessment of damages, and adjudicating that the use is public, and the taking necessary, etc., is the 'final judgment' from which an appeal may be taken." In the case of City of Los Angeles v. Pomeroy, 132 Cal. 340, 64 P. 477, which was a motion in the Supreme Court to stay proceedings pending an appeal from a final order of condemnation made by the lower court, the court, in speaking of the order, said: "This was a special order made after final judgment"—citing California Southern R. R. Co. v. Southern Pacific R. R. Co., supra.

The case of Heilbron v. Superior Court, 151 Cal. 271, 90 P. 706, grew out of a condemnation proceeding in which the plaintiff had judgment for the value of the land and injury resulting to the remaining land. Defendant then gave notice of intention to move for a new trial, and at the same time perfected his appeal from the judgment, which appeal was pending when the plaintiff made a motion in the trial court for an order under section 1254, Code of Civil Procedure, authorizing it to take immediate possession of the land described in the complaint. When the motion came on for hearing in the court below objection was made that the court had no jurisdiction to entertain the same, which objection was overruled, whereupon application for a writ of prohibition was made to the Supreme Court and decided in the opinion cited. The point raised here was not called to the attention of the court in the Heilbron Case. However, the court acted on the application, and, in view of that fact, and of the clear reading of section 1254, as well as the further fact that this section was not in force when the facts under the case of San Mateo v. Coburn, supra, arose, and in view of the decisions of the Supreme Court on the finality of the interlocutory judgment both before and after the Coburn Case, it would seem that the statement quoted from the Coburn Case is not now the law of this state.

[4, 5] (b) Counsel for appellant urge that interest should have been computed on the award made, citing Act 3757, page 1384, § 1, Deering's General Laws of California 1923, which provides that "the rate of interest * * * on * * * judgments rendered in any court of this state, shall be seven dollars upon the one hundred dollars for one year." Counsel urge that, interest not having been so computed, either from a date commencing thirty days after entry of the interlocutory judgment or from August 17, 1929, the date when plaintiff had sufficient money on hand to pay the judgment, and such amount not having been deposited, full compensation was not paid into court. Section 1249, Code of Civil Procedure, provides, among other things: "If an order be made letting the plaintiff into possession, as provided in section 1254, the compensation and damages awarded shall draw lawful interest from the date of such order." Such provision, however, is held by the Supreme Court to not apply to section 1254 as it now exists. Vallejo, etc., R. R. Co. v. Reed Orchard Co., 177 Cal. 249, 170 P. 426. The proceedings in this case were brought under the Street Opening Act of 1903, section 31 of which provides that, as soon as there is sufficient money in the hands of the city treasurer in the fund devoted to the proposed improvement to pay the amounts awarded defendant by the interlocutory judgment, it shall be paid to the parties entitled or into court for their benefit. The appellant concedes that plaintiff did not have such money on hand until August 17, 1929, and the record shows that the award in question here was paid into court that same day. The payment into court of the amount of the interlocutory judgment is equivalent to a tender thereof, and stops the running of interest. Vallejo, etc., R. R. Co. v. Reed Orchard Co., supra.

[6] (c) Must the court, in making an order under section 1254 of the Code of Civil Procedure, in all cases require the deposit of a sum in addition to the amount of the judgment? The facts involved in the case of Spring Valley Water Works v. Drinkhouse, 95 Cal. 220, 30 P. 218, 219, arose at the time section 1254 was in all substantial matters the same as now, and the court in discussing it said: "This section of the Code is not violative of any provision of the constitution, but directly in line with that instrument wherein it treats of such matters. Section 14, art. 1, provides: 'Private property shall not be taken or damaged for public use without just compensation having been first made to or paid into court for the owner.' It would seem that the framers of both the constitution and the statute had in view the delays incident to condemnation proceedings, and the necessity in many cases of allowing property to be taken and used for a public use during the progress of the litigation, provided an adequate fund to fully reimburse the landowner was first paid into court." It is interesting to note that section 1254 was amended in 1897 (St. 1897, p. 186, § 1) to provide for the making of an order for possession "at any time after the filing of the complaint, and the issuance and service of the summons thereon." Such provision was held violative of section 14, article 1, of the Constitution, as it then existed, because it permitted the taking of property without a judicial determination of the amount constituting "just compensation." Steinhart v. Superior Court, supra. Section 1254 was thereafter amended (St. 1903, p. 109, § 1) to provide that the property could be taken "at any time after trial and judgment entered," so as to meet the requirement of the Constitution, and in 1928 section 14 of article 1 of the Constitution itself was amended to provide that the state or a county, etc., may take "immediate possession and use of any right of way required for a public use * * * upon first commencing eminent domain proceedings * * * and thereupon giving such security in the way of money deposited as the court in which such proceedings are pending may direct." So it will be seen that now there would be no constitutional objection to a section similar to 1254 of the Code of Civil Procedure as it stood prior to its present form, even though the amount deposited would be entirely at the discretion of the court. The industry of counsel has not produced a case passing upon the point appellant urges here, nor has the court found one; but the plain reading of the section shows that the matter of any deposit, in addition to the full amount of the judgment, is in the discretion of the court. After providing for the payment of the amount of the judgment into court the section provides: "And such further sum as may be required by the court." Certainly, if the Legislature had intended to require the judge in every case to order the deposit of an additional sum, it would have used language expressing such intent, such, for example, as "and a further sum in such amount as the court may direct," leaving the amount only discretionary. But the language used leaves the matter of the payment into court of "such further sum" entirely to the court.

In section 1254 we find this language: "In ascertaining the amount to be paid into court, the court shall take care that the same be sufficient and adequate." It is plain that the Legislature in this cautionary advice to the court shows its desire that, in so far as is humanly possible, considering the discretion it gave the court in fixing the amount, an amount should be paid sufficient to cover any award that might be made in case the judgment or order is reversed on appeal and a larger sum fixed on the new trial; and it might be argued that, inasmuch as the interlocutory judgment is a fixed amount, the court could only need such advice in fixing the "further sum" mentioned, implying that in every case such "further sum" would be a part of the amount to be "ascertained" by the judge and "paid into court." We must take notice, however, of the fact that all appeals taken are not by the defendant by reason of inadequacy of the award, but that the plaintiff as well may appeal because of its exorbitance. Again, not every appeal is successful, nor does every new trial increase the amount of the former judgment, and the section plainly recognizes this well-known fact by providing that "in all cases where a new trial has been granted upon the application of the defendant, and he has failed upon such trial to obtain greater compensation than was allowed him upon the first trial, the costs of such new trial shall be taxed against him." Such argument does not give effect to what would seem to be the clear language of the section, and the cautionary advice would seem to apply only if in the discretion of the judge such "further sum" is required.

Are we compelled to read the word "may" as "must"? Such a change would not only be doing violence to the section as it seems to read, but to the English language as well; and reading it as "shall" would not, in our opinion, change the discretionary form of the sentence. The legislative intent was, as we have said, to provide, so far as humanly possible, to have deposited a sufficient sum to cover any award that might be made, but that intention is not helped, so far as we can see, by trying to make the section mandatory in the respect claimed by appellant, inasmuch as even then the amount would necessarily be in the discretion of the court, while the clear reading leaves the requiring of the further amount discretionary, and many cases would clearly not need such further sum to sufficiently secure the payment of the award. If the Legislature had desired to remove the chance of failure in the sufficiency of the deposit by reason of the exercise of discretion on the part of the court, it would no doubt have required the deposit of the amount fixed by the defendant in his answer, as the New York Code provides (Code Civ. Proc. § 3380), or in the largest amount testified to by any expert at the time of trial. So long as an appeal is pending, the action of the court in satisfying the judgment under section 31 of the Street Opening Act of 1903 is stayed (sections 946 and 949, Code Civ. Proc.), so there would seem to be no possibility of obtaining the final order of condemnation until the interlocutory judgment becomes final, unless the defendant is consenting thereto either expressly or by necessary implication; and, if the award should be increased as a result of the appeal, there would be no final judgment condemning the land until deposit or payment of the additional amount, and, if such deposit or payment were not made, the court having jurisdiction of the subject-matter and parties would oust the party seeking to condemn the property and mete out to the owner adequate damages for the temporary use and injury, applying the deposited sum thereto. State ex rel. Volunteer Mining Co. v. McHatton, 15 Mont. 159, 38 P. 711. And "as the detriment caused by the permanent taking of this land must certainly be greater than the detriment caused by its temporary use, we have in the award of the jury in the condemnation proceeding a fund of money which, as it is sufficient to pay all loss to the owner by reason of the permanent taking, is certainly sufficient to pay the minor loss caused by the temporary taking."

[7] The fixing of the "further sum" being in the discretion of the court and based upon conflicting evidence, viz., the interlocutory judgment, report of referees, etc., and the affidavit filed by appellant, it will not be disturbed by us. Daniels v. Church, 96 Cal. 13, 30 P. 798. It is to be remembered also that at the time the order was made by the lower court the interlocutory judgment had been affirmed on appeal, and a hearing has since been denied by the Supreme Court, so no abuse of discretion would appear to have been shown, even though the case is now pending on appeal before the United States Supreme Court. 51 S. Ct. —, 75 L. Ed. —.

There would seem to be no error committed by the court below in denying the motion to quash the order to show cause or in making the order for immediate possession.

WOODRUFF v. CITY OF LOS ANGELES et al.
Civ. 7560.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 2, California.

Dec. 12, 1930.

Eminent domain ☞258.

Judgment in condemnation proceeding having been affirmed on appeal, temporary supersedeas should not stand while case remained in appellate court for possible petition for rehearing.

Application by Leonard J. Woodruff against the City of Los Angeles and others for writ of supersedeas asking for stay of proceedings in trial court pending appeal.

Order for temporary supersedeas vacated.

J. A. Coleman and Ed. Fitzpatrick, both of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Erwin P. Werner, City Atty., Frederick Von Schrader, Asst. City Atty., and Loren A. Butts, Deputy City Atty., all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

WORKS, P. J.

This is an application for a writ of supersedeas, presented some time ago, asking for a stay of proceedings in the trial court in the case of City of Los Angeles v. J. G. Oliver, Leonard J. Woodruff, and others, then pending on appeal in this court and still pending here for certain purposes. Upon the presentation of the application a temporary supersedeas was ordered. Upon oral argument the order was not disturbed. On December 5, 1930, we filed our opinion disposing of the appeal, by it affirming the judgment, 294 P. 760.

This conclusion having been reached by us, we think the temporary supersedeas should not stand for the few remaining days during which the cause in which the appeal was taken will be sub judice in this court for the purpose of passing upon a possible petition for rehearing. All points presented on the appeal having been determined adversely to petitioner, appellant on the appeal, the cause is in a very different situation from that it occupied when the temporary supersedeas was issued. We are satisfied that the appeal is without merit.

The order for a temporary supersedeas is vacated.

I concur: IRA F. THOMPSON, J.

Neither CRAIG, J., nor ARCHBALD, Justice pro tem., who is now with the court, was present at the oral argument. Neither, therefore, participates in the foregoing decision.

HAYES v. EMERSON et al.

KING v. SAME.

Civ. 3941, 3942.

District Court of Appeal, Third District,
California.

Dec. 16, 1930.

Rehearing Denied Jan. 15, 1931. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 9, 1931.

1. Evidence ⇨359(1).

Photograph shown to be faithful representation of what it purports to reproduce is admissible as approximate aid in applying evidence.

2. Appeal and error ⇨970(2).

It is for trial court to determine whether photograph is correct representation of object, and its ruling will be sustained unless there has been abuse of discretion.

3. Appeal and error ⇨1050(1).

Evidence ⇨359(1).

In automobile collision case, admission of photograph of skid marks after they were painted held not abuse of discretion and not prejudicial.

A number of witnesses testified to the length and character of the skid marks, and also to the unlawful speed of defendant's automobile, so that facts in issue and sought to be proved by such marks were in evidence from several other independent sources.

4. Appeal and error ⇨699(4).

Instructions held reviewable, though record did not indicate whether they were proposed by appellant or respondents (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 953a, 650).

Respondents contended reviewing court must presume that instructions were proposed by appellant, and that he therefore could not attack them, but opportunity was offered to have incorporated in record information as to who proposed instructions, record being brought up under Code Civ. Proc. § 953a.

5. Automobiles ⇨246(60).

Instruction that defendant exceeding speed limit at obstructed intersection was conclusively presumed as matter of law guilty of negligence held not erroneous (St. 1923, p. 553, § 113(b)(2), as amended by St. 1927, p. 1436, § 30).

The instruction was challenged because it did not follow California Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 553) § 113(b)(2), as amended by St. 1927, p. 1436, § 30, providing that in all charges made thereunder proof of speed exceeding that allowed should be taken as prima facie evidence of violation, but not conclusive. However, language used in such section applied to facts involved in a criminal charge, and has nothing to do with negligence as matter of law.

6. Trial ⇨296(3).

Instruction respecting right of way of automobiles at intersection held not erroneous when considered with other instructions (St. 1923, p. 560, § 131, as amended by St. 1925, p. 412, § 15).

The instruction attacked because it was claimed defendant had the right of way at the intersection over car in which plaintiff was riding because entering intersection first, though other car was coming from defendant's right, stated that right of way is right to immediate use of highway, but that before driver of any vehicle is entitled to right of way he must be operating his vehicle within law. Other instructions were in the exact language of California Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 560) § 131, as amended by St. 1925, p. 412, § 15, relating to right of way when two vehicles approach intersection at approximately the same time.

Mr. Justice pro tem TUTTLE delivered the opinion of the court.

These are actions brought to recover damages on account of personal injuries received in an automobile collision. The two actions were consolidated and tried together. In each case the jury brought in a verdict for plaintiff against appellant only, and this appeal is taken from the judgments so rendered.

The plaintiffs were passengers in the automobile of defendant Fairfield, and the collision occurred at the intersection of two streets in the city of Roseville. Reversal of the judgments is sought upon the following grounds: Firstly, that the court erred in admitting a certain photograph in evidence, and, secondly, upon the ground that the court erred in giving two instructions.

The charge of negligence against defendant Emerson was that of excessive speed in approaching an intersection of highways when the driver's view is obstructed, in violation of the California Vehicle Act, § 113, subsection (b), subdivision 2 (St. 1923, p. 553, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1436, § 30). This act fixes the lawful speed under such circumstances at 15 miles per hour. It is not disputed that there is evidence which would justify the jury in finding that the physical facts made this section of the law applicable to the case.

[1-3] Within an hour after the accident, witness Edwin Overhalter testified that he arrived at the scene from Sacramento; that along the street where defendant Emerson's car approached the intersection he found skid marks four inches in width; that these marks extended from 40 to 45 feet; that these skid marks were on the pavement and showed black burned rubber; that he had the marks painted with white lime, and that they were photographed the next day. The photograph was admitted in evidence, and this is assigned as prejudicial error.

The rule of evidence with reference to admitting photographs in evidence is found in 10

California Jurisprudence, page 896: "Where a photograph is shown to be a faithful representation of what it purports to reproduce, it is admissible as an approximate aid in applying the evidence, and this is equally true whether the photograph be of persons, things, or places. * * * It is for the trial court to determine whether a photograph offered is a correct representation of the object or scene in question, and its ruling will be sustained on appeal unless it is apparent that there has been an abuse of discretion."

It is not seriously questioned by appellant that, if a photograph of the marks had been taken before they were painted, it would have been admissible. The chief objection appears to be that the marks were painted before being photographed. The cases relied upon by appellant are those which involve a reproduction by photography of a planned or hypothetical situation or condition, and the photographs were offered more for the purpose of illustrating certain theories as to how the accident happened. In the instant case several witnesses testified that the painting followed the line of the skid marks. It may be true, as appellant says, that "it (the photograph) formed a graphic and inescapable representation of appellant's skid marks which no amount of oral testimony could contravene." This is simply an admission that the facts sought to be proven were true, but that they were too vividly portrayed before the jury. We are satisfied that the instant case does not come within the rule contended for by appellant. No object in the photograph was placed before the jury which was not there at the time of the accident. We see no reason why the mere painting of an object, in order that it may be more vividly reproduced by means of photography, renders the photograph inadmissible. This is always subject to the rule that the trial court must be satisfied that the object photographed is a faithful representation of what it purports to reproduce. If the color of the marks were an issue in the case, a more serious question would be presented. No such contention is made here. Necessarily, a large measure of discretion is vested in the trial court in ruling upon a question of this character. We cannot say that the court here abused its discretion. Furthermore, we are not prepared to hold that this evidence was prejudicial to defendants or that the jury would have arrived at a different conclusion if it had been excluded. A number of witnesses testified to the length and character of the skid marks and also to the unlawful speed of defendant's automobile. Thus the fact in issue (and sought to be proved by these marks) was in evidence from several other independent sources.

[4] Error is assigned in the giving of two instructions. There is nothing in the record to indicate whether they were proposed by appellant or respondents. The latter now contend that this court must presume that these instructions were proposed by appellant, and that he therefore cannot attack them, under the authority of 2 Cal. Jur., p. 870; Fawkes v. Reynolds, 190 Cal. 204, 211 P. 449, 451; Finkelstein v. Cosgrove, 83 Cal. App. 201, 256 P. 605; Gray v. Eschen, 125 Cal. 1, 57 P. 664, and other cases. The case of Fawkes v. Reynolds, appears to be the most recent pronouncement of the Supreme Court upon this question. In that case the record failed to show by whom the instructions were offered, but the court considered the sufficiency of the instructions, over the objections of respondent. While stating the rule to be that under such circumstances instructions would not ordinarily be reviewed, the court went on to say: "In the bill of exceptions now before us it appears that the instructions were all given by the court, and under the law since 1909 each party has an exception thereto. Code Civ. Proc. § 647; Stats. 1909, p. 586. Without further showing in the bill of exceptions the plaintiff is entitled to attack the correctness of the instruction. If the instruction was given at the request of the plaintiff, that fact should have been made manifest by the incorporation of plaintiff's instruction in the bill of exceptions or by a statement that the instruction was given at plaintiff's request."

While the record in the instant case is brought up under section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure, we see no reason why the same rule should not apply. Under the terms of that section a phonographic report of the trial is filed, and the clerk of the court is required to give the attorneys five days' notice of the settlement and allowance of the same before the trial judge. Thus an opportunity was offered respondent to have incorporated in the record information as to who proposed the instructions in question. In this respect respondent had the same rights as are afforded a litigant where an appeal is taken under a bill of exceptions. Code Civ. Proc. § 650. Adopting the conclusions and reasoning of the Fawkes Case, we hold that the instructions are reviewable.

[5] The court instructed the jury in the following language:

"If you find from the evidence that defendant Emerson, or the defendant Fairfield, at the time immediately preceding the collision mentioned in the complaints in these actions, was traversing the intersection of Oak and Judah Streets, in the City of Roseville, California, at the time mentioned in said complaints, and that at any time while he or they were traveling the last one hundred feet of his or their approach to such intersection he or they did not have a clear and uninterrupted view of such intersection and of the traffic upon the streets entering such intersection for a distance of 200 feet from such intersection, and that in traversing such intersection he or they was traveling at that time at a speed in excess of fifteen miles an hour, then, and in that event you are instructed that defendant Emerson, or the defendant Fairfield, or both of them as the case may be, is or are conclusively presumed as a matter of law to have been guilty of negligence at the time of said collision.

"If you further believe from the evidence that plaintiffs or either of them sustained injury or injuries by reason of said collision and that such negligence if any, on the part of said defendant or defendants proximately caused or contributed in any way to the injuries if any, of plaintiffs or either of them, and that the plaintiffs were free of contributory negligence, then your verdict must be in favor of either or both of the plaintiffs and against such defendant or defendants, or either of them, as the case may be."

It is contended that this instruction is erroneous in that, under the facts recited therein, the jury is told that "defendant Emerson, or the defendant Fairfield, or both of them as the case may be, is or are conclusively presumed as a matter of law to have been guilty of negligence at the time of said collision." The only authority submitted by appellant is the California Vehicle Act, section 113, subsection (b), subdivision 2 (St. 1923, p. 553 as amended by St. 1927 p. 1436, § 30), which read, at the time of the accident, as follows:

"(b) * * * it shall be lawful for the driver of a vehicle to drive the same at a speed not exceeding the following: * * *

"2. Fifteen miles an hour in traversing an intersection of highways when the driver's view is obstructed. * * * [The statute then defines an obstructed view intersection.] * * *

"(c) In all charges for a violation of this section, speeds in excess of those set forth in subdivision (b) of this section shall be taken as prima facie but not as conclusive evidence of a violation of this section. * * *

The only point made by appellant is that this instruction does not follow the section which provides that in all charges made thereunder proof of speed in excess of that allowed shall be taken as prima facie, but not as conclusive evidence of a violation of the section. We are of the opinion that the language used in said section applies to facts involved in a criminal charge, and that it has nothing to do with negligence as a matter of law. An instruction upon this section of the California Vehicle Act was given in the case of Benjamin v. Noonan, 207 Cal. 279, 282, 277 P. 1045, 1046, where the court charged the jury to the effect "that a violation thereof constituted negligence as a matter of law." In that case the court said:

"Appellants complain of an instruction given by the court at its own instance which first stated the provisions of the Motor Vehicle Act (Stats. 1923, p. 517) to the effect that vehicles shall be driven on the public highways at a careful, prudent, reasonable, and proper speed, so as not to endanger the life, limb, or property of any person and that it shall be lawful to drive at a speed not exceeding 15 miles an hour in traversing an intersection of highways where the view is obstructed, etc., and then charged that a violation thereof constituted negligence as a matter of law. They contend for the distinction that an infraction of said provisions would constitute not negligence per se, but mere evidence of negligence which might or might not amount to proof of negligence.

"We find no error in said instruction. As said in Scragg v. Sallee, 24 Cal. App. 133, 144, 140 P. 706, 710: 'While it is undoubtedly correct to say that the act of driving a vehicle over a street or public highway beyond the speed limit established by a municipal ordinance or a statute merely constitutes evidence of negligence in cases where damage has followed the infraction of such an ordinance or law, the rule in this state is, however, that it is conclusive evidence of negligence (citing cases). Therefore, the statement that such an act is "of itself negligence," or "negligence as a matter of law" or "negligence per se" (equivalent expressions) is, in this state, strictly correct'"—citing cases.

The instruction in the instant case is to the same effect as that given in the Benjamin Case. Here defendant is conclusively presumed, as a matter of law, to be guilty of negligence, while in the other case the jury is told that a violation of the section is negligence as a matter of law. Under either instruction, if the facts recited are found to be true by the jury, it has nothing further to do with negligence as a matter of law, its sole function in this connection being to decide, as a matter of fact, whether or not such negligence is actionable, that is, whether or not it proximately caused the injury. Such was the effect of the instruction in this case, and we do not question its correctness.

[6] The other instruction attacked by appellant reads as follows: "Right of way is defined by the law to be the right to the immediate use of the highway and certain rules have been laid down as to which of two or more vehicles has the right of way under certain specified conditions; before the driver of any vehicle is entitled to the right of way such driver himself must be operating his vehicle within the law and not in violation thereof, and no operator of any vehicle has the right of way at a time when he himself is violating the law."

Section 131 of the California Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 560 as amended by St. 1925, p. 412 § 15) in force at the time of the accident provided: "(a) When two vehicles approach an intersection of public highways at approximately the same time, the vehicle approaching from the right shall have the right of way, provided such vehicle is traveling at a lawful speed."

Appellant's argument is "that if appellant's car, as the jury was entitled to find, entered the intersection at a time substantially prior to Fairfield's car, then the appellant had the right of way, even though Fairfield was approaching from the right." If there were any force or merit to this contention, it is entirely dissipated by the fact that the jury was elsewhere charged exactly in the language of the section last cited. We see no prejudice in the giving of the instruction complained of. Construing these two instructions together, there is nothing in them which is contrary to the law as contended for by appellant. If appellant desired the jury to be informed upon the law with reference to the relative rights of two vehicles approaching an intersection, where the one upon the left enters prior to the one upon the right, he should have submitted such an instruction to the court. We are satisfied that the instructions, as a whole, stated the law with clarity and precision, and that the jury were not misled upon the law of the case.

There being no error in the record, it is ordered that the judgments be affirmed.

Dutton & Gilkey, of Oakland, for respondent.

Mr. Justice pro tem. TUTTLE delivered the opinion of the court.

The appeal of defendant Fairfield is based upon the sole contention that the right of the guest in this case to recover for personal injuries received in an automobile collision was destroyed by section 141½ of the California Vehicle Act of 1929 (St. 1929, p. 1580). In our original opinion (288 P. 1099) this point was decided adversely to this appellant. A rehearing was granted upon the showing that the question involved was pending before the Supreme Court. In the case of Callet v. Alioto, 290 P. 438, the Supreme Court definitely determined that this section is not retroactive, and this decision has become final. We therefore adopt the conclusion reached by this court in the original opinion.

As to the other appellants, after a further consideration of the case, we see no reason why the conclusion reached by the court in the original opinion should be disturbed, and it is therefore adopted as the opinion of the court upon this rehearing.

The order granting a new trial in respect to appellant Emerson is affirmed, and the judgment against appellants Fairfield, Monroe, Lyon, and Miller, Inc., and W. B. Moyle is affirmed.

1. Appeal and error ⇨931(1).

Evidence supporting finding must be accepted as true and reasonable inferences therefrom considered in examining sufficiency of evidence to support finding.

2. Appeal and error ⇨931(1).

In examining sufficiency of evidence to support finding, appellate court must resolve every substantial conflict in testimony in favor of finding.

3. Nuisance ⇨49(5).

Evidence held insufficient to support finding that vibrations from operation of machinery caused no personal discomfort nor damage to property of adjoining owners.

4. Evidence ⇨597.

Evidence must be substantial to support questioned finding.

5. Nuisance ⇨49(5).

That property of complaining owner was located within 150 feet of plant, and that owner lived therein before operation of plant, must be considered in determining whether nuisance existed, but is not conclusive.

6. Nuisance ⇨43.

Zoning for semi-industrial purposes of territory in which complaining owners resided did not preclude recovery of damages by operation of machinery constituting private nuisance.

7. Nuisance ⇨5.

Owner of property must not use it even in lawful business as to interfere with another in legitimate use of his property.

8. Nuisance ⇨19.

If nuisance invades private right, cause of action for injunction exists.

9. Nuisance ⇨3(5).

Operation of machinery for light and power plant causing vibrations to property of complaining owner held private nuisance.

10. Trial ⇨375.

Observation by trial court in inspecting premises claimed to have been damaged by operation of machinery is evidence.

11. Trial ⇨375.

Inspection by trial court of premises claimed damaged by operation of machinery not made during nighttime, when most of discomforts complained of appeared, held insufficient to sustain finding that operation did not cause damage.

12. Nuisance ⇨49(5).

Evidence of vibrations caused by operation of light plant, though not showing vibrations loosened and cracked plaster of residence, showed value of residence was diminished.

13. Nuisance ⇨4.

WARMER, Justice pro tem.

The complaint, so far as pertinent here, alleges damage to the properties owned and occupied by the plaintiffs and damages for the personal discomfort of plaintiffs because of the vibrations, noises, shaking, and jarring of the residences of plaintiffs caused by the operation of a certain gas engine, compressor, and machinery of the defendants operated in the neighborhood of the residences of said plaintiffs.

The answer denies the damage, but admits the operation of said machinery; alleges that the plant is operated in what might be termed an industrial part of said city; that said plant was necessary in the opinion of said city for the purpose of supplying light and power for said city; that said plant was constructed and operated in a skilful and reasonable manner.

The court found that the plant was properly constructed and installed, and skillfully operated; that the operation thereof caused vibrations of, and in, the residences of plaintiffs, but caused no damage to the properties, neither did said operation of said plant cause personal discomfort to the plaintiffs or any of them, and gave judgment for defendants. From this judgment plaintiffs appeal.

[1, 2] Appellants urge the insufficiency of the evidence to support the findings. In examining the sufficiency of the evidence to support a questioned finding, an appellate court must accept as true all evidence tending to establish the correctness of the finding as made, taking into account, as well, all inferences which might reasonably have been drawn by the trial court to lead to the same conclusion; and every substantial conflict in the testimony is to be resolved in favor of the finding. Bancroft-Whitney Co. v. McHugh, 166 Cal. 140, 134 P. 1157.

The evidence most favorable to respondents to sustain the questioned finding is as follows: First, that there were vibrations in the residences of the appellants to such an extent that a bouquet of flowers on a dining room table shook slightly; that a picture hanging on the wall of one of the residences shook slightly, such shaking was apparent by the changing reflections of the light on the picture; that the perfume in a small bottle placed on a dresser moved slightly on account of the vibrations; that the lace or fringe on the shade of a small floor lamp shook slightly; that no vibrations were noticeable while standing on the floor of either house, but that, when a person leaned against the door or doorframe a vibration was noticeable; that some of respondents' witnesses did not observe any vibration while sitting in a chair of the residences of the plaintiffs, while others did; that such vibrations were continuous when plant was operating; that plant operated more or less continuously day and night; that vibrations were more noticeable at some hours than at others; second, that the residences of appellants were in a section of the city where there was a lemon and orange association building, a junk yard, a building that had been formerly used as a livery stable but was then being used as a transfer and truck building; that there had been a marmalade factory in the neighborhood which was then being used as a fertilizer plant; that the railroad main track and switches were close by; and that the property of the appellants was on a main public thoroughfare upon which there was heavy traffic; third, that the court visited the premises on two occasions during the course of the trial; that on one occasion the Fendleys, appellants, were having the plaster on their house repaired and the plasterer testified that he had difficulty in getting the plaster to stick to the lath because of vibrations in the building; fourth, that such a plant cannot be operated without vibration and the load thereof does not affect the vibrations caused; that the plant was skillfully installed and reasonably operated.

The appellants testified, and it is not denied, that Mrs. Fendley and Mrs. Timme were disturbed in their sleep, became nervous and irritable after and during the operation of said plant; that they had no such trouble or difficulty before said plant was put in operation; that Mrs. Timme's tenants complained of the vibrations and others threatened to leave the premises if the vibrations continued; that appellants, on a number of occasions, got up during the night and plugged the doors and windows to stop their rattling; that a guest member of the Fendley home was unable to sleep on at least one occasion and left the Fendley house in the nighttime; that another guest member of the Fendley family was unable to partake of a meal at the Fendley home because of sickness caused by the vibrations; that dishes on the dining room table rattled during the mealtime. The evidence on the part of appellants described the vibrations, shaking, and jarring over a period beginning with the installation of the plant and as very much more pronounced than respondent's evidence indicated, and continuing to the time of the trial, while respondent's evidence consists largely of persons who made a more or less casual inspection and observation of the premises during the course of the trial. No observations were made by respondent, so far as the record goes, during the nighttime.

[3, 4] Applying the rule for the appellate court in examining a questioned finding, we are of the opinion that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the finding, in fact, we cannot perceive how a residence could escape some appreciable damage from a vibration that would cause a bouquet of flowers on the dining room table to reveal the vibrations, and liquid in small bottles to manifest the presence of vibrations; in fact, it appears by respondent's own evidence that they were of such a nature as to declare the presence of vibrations or shaking that would materially damage property. The evidence of respondent does not meet the requirement of law that the evidence must be substantial in order to support a questioned finding.

[5, 6] The fact that appellants' properties were located within one hundred to one hundred fifty feet of respondent's plant constitutes one of the circumstances that must be taken into consideration in arriving at a conclusion as to whether or not a nuisance existed, also the fact that appellants resided there prior to the installation and operation of this plant by respondent, but are not conclusive. McIntosh v. Brimmer, 68 Cal. App. 770, 230 P. 203. Respondents rely upon the fact that the territory in which the property of appellants is located having been zoned by the respondent for semi-industrial purposes places the appellants in a different situation than they would have been had no zoning existed, and therefore they are not entitled to the relief sought. The appellate court in the case of Williams v. Blue Bird Laundry Company, 85 Cal. App. 388, at page 392, 259 P. 484, 485, said: "It seems to be assumed that because the premises on which the laundry is situated were zoned to permit the maintenance of such establishments, all persons building residences in that vicinity must submit to such discomforts and injuries as are ordinarily incident to the operation of similar industries in the manner in which they are customarily conducted. We do not understand this to be the law. The doctrine of coming to a nuisance was long ago exploded. The operation of a business under municipal permission does not justify the creation or continuance of a private nuisance. [Citing cases.]"

[7, 8] An owner of property must not use it even in a lawful business in such a manner as to interfere with another in the legitimate use of his property. Tuebner v. California Street, etc., 66 Cal. 171, 4 P. 1162. If a nuisance invades a distinct private right, a cause of action for injunction exists. Williams v. Blue Bird Laundry, supra.

[9] Applying the rules above stated we are of the opinion that the operation of the gas engine and compressor and machinery of respondents under all the circumstances here was a private nuisance, and was an invasion of a distinct private right of the appellants, both as to property and personal right of comfortable use of their residences.

[10-12] The trial court having inspected the premises, of course what it observed is evidence. However, after such inspection we find that the record discloses the court, in a summary of the case, at the conclusion of the trial, says that (which is not evidence) he discovered vibrations, the presence of which was made manifest in the same manner as the witnesses had described, and he also observed a rattling of the windows. Under such circumstances, at most the observations of the court while viewing the premises were simply in corroboration of the evidence. However, there is no evidence that any observation of the conditions present upon the premises of appellants were made by the court at nighttime when most of the discomforts complained of appeared. We are of the opinion that under such circumstances the inspection of the premises by the court cannot add sufficient weight to sustain the questioned finding. Under all the circumstances disclosed here it would be scarcely necessary to produce evidence that the vibrations would not have a tendency to, and, in fact, loosen and crack the plaster. However, the plasterer testified that he had difficulty in making the plaster stick to the laths because of the vibrations present. We are of the opinion that said plant as operated by said respondent diminished the value of appellants' property.

[13-15] The law of nuisances where personal discomfort is the ground of complaint is only applied to normal persons, to persons of normal sensibilities. McIntosh v. Brimmer, supra. The record is silent as to any evidence from which a conclusion or inference could be drawn by the appellants, Mrs. Timme and Mrs. Fendley, were persons of other than ordinary sensibilities. The evidence, without contradiction, shows that they were each disturbed by the conditions created by the operations of respondent's plant. If evidence were offered tending to show that the conditions here would have no detrimental effect upon a person of ordinary sensibilities, common experience would dictate that such evidence would necessarily be subjected to great scrutiny because of its inherent improbability. The fact that tenants of Mrs. Timme were leaving, or threatening to leave, her premises unless such vibrations ceased, would indicate the vibrations were of such character as not to comport with comfort; the fact that guests of Mrs. Fendley left in the nighttime because of their inability to sleep on account of such vibrations, and that certain guests could not eat a meal at the home of Mrs. Fendley because the vibrations caused illness, does not comport with a right of comfort in the use of the premises. In order to justify an abatement of a nuisance it is not necessary that the health of the plaintiff or members of his family should have been impaired. Judson v. Los Angeles, etc., 157 Cal. 168, 106 P. 581, 26 L. R. A. (N. S.) 183, 21 Ann. Cas. 1247.

[16-18] The fact that the neighborhood in which the plaintiffs' residence was located was devoted to some extent to industry did not authorize the defendant to conduct his business in such a manner as to interfere with the right of plaintiff to the comfort of her residence. Dauberman v. Grant, 198 Cal. 586, 246 P. 319, 48 A. L. R. 1244. In the instant case, taking all the evidence most favorable to the respondents, together with every legitimate inference that could be drawn therefrom, shows beyond doubt that the operation of respondent's plant detrimentally affected the value of appellants' property and infringed upon the rights of appellants to a comfortable use of their residences to their damage. The injury being appreciable, the quantum thereof must be fixed by the trial court. The fact that the plant was properly installed and skillfully operated gives no right to the respondent to thus invade the rights of appellants.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment is reversed.

1. Vendor and purchaser ⇨351(1).

Damages for vendor's breach of executory contract would, under statute, be amount purchaser had paid, less proportionate share of loss in operating land (Civ. Code, § 3306).

Under the executory contract, the purchaser was to receive one-third interest in the land and one-third of profits, and take proportionate share in losses, if any. Civ. Code, § 3306, provides that detriment caused by breach of agreement to convey an estate in real property is deemed to be price paid, plus certain charges and interest.

2. Vendor and purchaser ⇨351(1).

Statute could not be invoked to limit damages which purchaser could recover for vendor's breach of executory contract, where nothing showed what full performance on both sides would have cost purchaser (Civ. Code, § 3358).

Broadway, San Diego, California, also his luggage and jewelry stock at 6th Street and E. Street, No. 534 San Diego, California, said stock free and clear from all indebtedness, as per inventory taken by Mr. I. Fream on or about the 17th day of October, except amount sold since that date as follows: about $500.00.

"It is hereby agreed and understood that first party is trading the above mentioned property for 508 acres of land situated about 2½ miles east of Brawley, Imperial Valley, California, consideration of said land to be about $81,000.00 including stock and implements for which second party is to receive contract for a 1-3 interest and be credited for his 1-3 interest $11,500.00 and receive 1-3 the profits and share in the losses if there be any of said farm. It is understood and agreed that second party will furnish one man competent to do farm work who will be under the supervision of First Party at all times and should he at any time fail to furnish a competent man, then first party can at his option hire a man and pay him out of the proceeds of second party's 1-3 interest. First party will look after and manage said farm without any expense to second party. It is understood and agreed that First Party will discharge the wholesale bills now as debt against the Broadway stock as per list attached hereto. It is agreed that for the difference between $11,500.00 and the purchase price of the land that first party will wait on second party until such time as the land shows sufficient profit to take care of said difference, or a sale is made, or second party may at his election have his 1-3 interest set off after the expiration of one year, commencing at the southeast corner and taking a strip along the east side equal to the 1-3 interest by paying First Party whatever amount is due and unpaid at said time of division. First Party may also call for a division of said land on same basis as above stated. In case of a division of said land both parties shall choose an Imperial man acquainted with values of such land and they shall choose a third man and the three shall determine the price of land and their decision shall be the basis of settlement. It is agreed and understood that First Party shall have full supervision and management of said farm at all times with authority to buy and sell stock and feed as he may elect, that he will keep a set of books and make a complete accounting of all transactions to second party at least once a year for the term of this contract.

"Should First Party fail to make the exchange as above stated then this contract is null and void.

"It is understood and agreed that First Party is not contracting or obligating himself to pay any debts or obligations of second party other than those mentioned in the sheet hereto attached.

"It is further agreed that unless land is sold or divided as heretofore stated there is sufficient profit to take care of the interest and principle, First Party will not force payment for ten years from date.

"Second Party M. Wolfson.

"First Party P. I. Haddan.

"Witness D. J. Fream."

In pursuance thereof, plaintiff delivered to defendant his interest in the business, receiving credit therefor in the sum of $11,500, and in addition thereto paid to the defendant $4,152.03 in cash, making a total of $15,652.03 which was applied upon the contract price. Defendant, after operating the ranch for some time as provided in the contract, repudiated the contract with plaintiff and sold the ranch to third parties. Plaintiff brought suit for damages for the breach.

In addition to above facts, the findings of the court show, among other things, that the defendant did not act in bad faith in permanently putting it out of his power to perform said contract; that the value of the land at the date of the breach of the contract was $45,720, and that the value of plaintiff's one-third interest therein, had the contract been fully performed at the date of said breach, would have been $15,240; also that in the operation of the ranch there was a loss and the share of said loss chargeable to plaintiff was the sum of $1,894.04.

As conclusions of law from these facts, the court found that, by section 3306 of the Civil Code, plaintiff would be entitled to judgment against defendant in the sum of \$15,652.03 (the amount paid on the purchase price), less a credit in defendant's favor of \$1,894.04 (the proportionate share of loss sustained in operating the ranch), or the sum of \$13,757.99, together with interest at 7 per cent. per annum from January 5, 1924 (the date of breach); but the court further found that recovery under section 3306, supra, was limited by section 3358 of the Civil Code, and that plaintiff therefore was entitled to but $15\frac{1}{27}$ of \$15,240 (the value of plaintiff's interest in the ranch at the date of the breach), which would be the sum of \$8,466.60, less the credit of \$1,894.04, or the sum of \$6,752.56, together with interest at 7 per cent. per annum from January 5, 1924, and costs of suit.

[1] From the judgment entered pursuant to these findings and conclusions, defendant appeals on the ground that the court erred in calculating the matter of damages and did not apply the proper rule therefor. Defendant takes the position that, while the exact proposition here involved has not heretofore been decided in this state, the courts of other jurisdictions, as well as text-writers on the subject of damages, have definitely laid down the rule that in cases of this character, where part of the purchase price is paid and the purchaser sues for damages, the amount of damages allowable is the difference between the balance owing on the agreed purchase price and the actual value of the property at the time of the breach; and that, since the sum of $13,242.01 is still due on the contract, and $15,240 is the value of the plaintiff's interest in the ranch at the date of the breach, plaintiff is entitled to the sum of $1,997.99 only.

Assuming that the rule in many jurisdictions is as appellant contends, yet that is not the law in California. Section 3300 of the Civil Code definitely declares the general rule of measure of damages for breach of contract to be the amount which will compensate the party aggrieved for all the detriment proximately caused thereby, or which in the ordinary course of things would be likely to result therefrom. Section 3306, Civil Code, makes the pronouncement that "the detriment caused by the breach of an agreement to convey an estate in real property is deemed to be the price paid," plus certain expenses and interest, with an additional allowance in case of bad faith. Therefore, under this latter section, plaintiff would be entitled to the sum of $15,652.03, the amount which he has paid on the contract, with said expenses and interest, less his proportionate share of the loss sustained by defendant in operating the ranch.

[2] If, however, the right of recovery is limited by section 3358 of the Civil Code, it would cause considerable reduction in the amount of the judgment for damages. The contract in question is uncertain as to what amount would have to be paid to fully perform it and is uncertain as to the time of performance. There is no evidence as to what the value of the ranch would be at any time, except only at the date of the breach.

Apparently, from the record, the agreement had been fully performed by plaintiff up to the time the contract was breached by the defendant by a sale of the land itself. It will be observed that the contract does not provide anything definite as to time of payment, except that first party would apparently not be able to force payment until ten years from its date. Under the contract the first party had the right to buy and sell stock and feed, as he might elect, but it would evidently take the consent of both parties for a sale of the land to be made.

It will also be noted that it was also agreed that for the difference between $11,500 and the purchase price of the land that the first party would wait on second party until such time as the land showed sufficient profit to take care of said difference, or a sale was made. The first party did not call for a division of the land, but sold the same and placed it beyond his power to comply with the terms of the contract. As there is nothing in the record to show what full performance of the contract on both sides would have cost the plaintiff, section 3358, supra, cannot be invoked to limit the amount of damages which may be recovered by plaintiff. The trial court having limited recovery to a sum less than plaintiff was entitled to, even though he were allowed the $1,000 referred to in appellant's second point, and as the plaintiff is not appealing, appellant cannot now be heard to complain.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

MERRILL v. NORMANDIE CORPORATION
(WALKER et al., Interveners).

Civ. 7635.

District Court of Appeal, First District,
Division 2, California.

Dec. 24, 1930.

1. Appeal and error ⇨1039(4).

Failure to allege consideration was unavailable on review where parties went to trial and proved, and trial court found, consideration.

2. Appeal and error ⇨1012(1).

Weight of evidence and burden of proof become academic, where trial court has found essential facts upon substantial evidence.

3. Corporations ⇨519(3).

Evidence held to sustain finding of consideration supporting corporation's notes to director.

4. Corporations ⇨309(2).

Single director is not precluded from taking notes or other security for money advanced to corporation's use, if transaction is free from fraud (Civ. Code, § 2235).

5. Corporations ⇨309(2).

In assignee's action on corporation's notes to director, court having found that notes were valid and assigned for valuable consideration, plaintiff's knowledge was immaterial.

6. Corporations ⇨518(1).

In assignee's action on corporation's notes executed to director, evidence of directors' incapacity to bind corporation because of transaction occurring subsequent to assignment held irrelevant, especially where not pleaded.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; Charles R. Barnard, Judge.

Action by George E. Merrill against the Normandie Corporation, in which A. R. Walker and others, preferred stockholders of defendant corporation, intervened. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, interveners appeal.

Affirmed.

NOURSE, P. J.

Plaintiff sued as assignee of six promissory notes executed by the defendant corporation. The cause was tried without a jury and resulted in a judgment for plaintiff as prayed. The appellants are all preferred stockholders of the defendant corporation who intervened and who appeal from the judgment on type-written transcripts.

Karl Elliott, Kathryn Elliott, his wife, and one Bowman, his grandfather, composed the board of directorate of the Normandie Corporation. The notes in suit were executed by the officers of the corporation by authorization of the board of directors in consideration of money loaned to the corporation by Karl Elliott, who was named as payee in each note. All were assigned by Elliott to the plaintiff in consideration for money advanced by plaintiff to Elliott.

On this appeal the appellants advance four points for a reversal of the judgment which we will consider in order.

[1] 1. The complaint fails to state a cause of action because it appears on the face of each note that it was issued to one of the trustees of the stockholders of the corporation, but the complaint fails to allege that the notes were executed for a good and valid consideration. If the point were good on demurrer to the complaint, it is not good here, because the parties went to trial and proved a good and valid consideration and the trial court held accordingly. Etienne v. Kendall, 202 Cal. 251, 255, 256, 259 P. 752.

[2, 3] 2. There is no presumption of consideration in the execution of the notes, and the burden of proof is therefore upon the plaintiff. Upon the same line of reasoning the point is of no interest on this appeal. Assuming that the usual presumption of consideration from the written instrument does not apply to a note executed under these circumstances, and assuming that the burden of proof is then upon plaintiff to show consideration, these issues lose their importance when the issues have been fairly tried and the trial court has affirmatively found that the consideration was good and valid. In other words, the question of the weight of evidence and the question of upon whom rests the burden of proof become purely academic when the trial court has found upon substantial evidence that the essential facts have been proved.

Appellants merely suggest in their opening brief that the finding of consideration is not supported by the evidence, but we cannot take them seriously in this, as the evidence is clear that the notes were executed in payment for moneys advanced to the use of the corporation by the payee, and there is not an iota of evidence to the contrary.

[4] In this connection it is argued strenuously by appellants that, as the directors were trustees for the stockholders, every transaction by which they obtained any advantage from the corporation is presumed to have been without sufficient consideration in accordance with the provisions of section 2235, Civil Code. Numerous cases are cited following the Code section, some of which deal with directors of corporations. Nothing would be served by analyzing these cases here. It is sufficient to say that the rule which they follow does not preclude a single director from dealing directly with a corporation, and does not preclude him from taking a note or other security for money advanced by him to the use of the corporation. The rule applicable here is found aptly stated in Schnittger v. Old Home, etc., Min. Co., 144 Cal. 603, 606, 607, 78 P. 9, and in Todd v. Temple Hospital Ass'n, 96 Cal. App. 42, 273 P. 595, where numerous authorities are cited. We have not overlooked the point at which the two paths diverge—that the transaction must be free from fraud. But, though we find some suspicions of fraud in counsel's briefs, there is no evidence of it. On the other hand, we find that the appellants did not plead fraud in the execution and delivery of the notes. They alleged circumstances occurring after the notes were delivered, but these allegations were made solely for the purpose of showing the need of intervention. Hence the trial court's finding that the transaction was in good faith and for a valuable consideration takes the case out of the rule of the cases cited by appellants.

[5] 3. The plaintiff was not an innocent purchaser for value. The argument on this point is predicated on the proposition hereinbefore discussed—that the notes were void under section 2235, Civil Code. But, as the notes were found to be valid obligations of the corporation which were assigned to the plaintiff for a valuable consideration, the "knowledge" of the purchaser is of no moment.

[6] 4. That the directors who authorized the execution of the notes were not de jure, but were merely de facto and hence incapable of binding the corporation in this manner. The argument is based upon the assertions made in appellants' briefs that the corporation had failed to comply with the conditions of the state commissioner of corporations relating to the transfer of real property to the corporation. We cannot see how the issue is properly before us. It was not pleaded in the complaint in intervention, and was not found by the trial court. This case, with case No. 7636, Elliott v. Normandie Corp., 294 P. 776, which follows, was jointly tried with another action brought by these interveners against the three directors of the corporation. At the opening of the trial a stipulation was made that the evidence taken might apply to all three cases. When testimony relating to the transfer of this real property was offered, it was objected to by counsel representing the plaintiffs in each of the suits on these promissory notes, but the testimony was received under interveners' promise to connect it up. Near the end of the trial motions were made to strike this testimony, and these were denied. Thereupon counsel for these interveners, plaintiffs in the accounting suit, dismissed their action for an accounting.

Now the only testimony in the record upon which the argument can be predicated is that the Elliots deeded the real property to the corporation in full accord with the demands of the commissioner of corporations and thereafter issued certificates of stock to themselves and to the interveners as well. Though this deed was not recorded, it was delivered to and held by the corporation secretary. It was then shown that in February, 1927, long subsequent to the execution of the notes in suit, and some three months after the assignment of the last of these notes, the directors purported to reconvey this property to the Elliots in exchange for other property conveyed to the corporation—that they then personally conveyed the property mentioned in the commissioner's certificate to another. Though the evidence of these transactions would have been relevant to an issue of fraud involving the directors of the corporation, it had no relevancy to the issues raised in this action on the promissory notes, first, because the facts were not put in issue by any pleading, and, second, because the transactions occurred subsequent to the assignment of the notes and had no bearing upon the validity of the notes nor upon the assignment to the respondent.

The judgment is affirmed.

SMITH v. STATE BAR OF CALIFORNIA.

L. A. 12468.

Supreme Court of California.

Dec. 31, 1930.

Attorney and client ☞ 53(2).

In disciplinary proceedings against attorney, evidence showing attorney's connection with ambulance chasing organization held to warrant suspension for limited period.

LANGDON and CURTIS, JJ., dissenting.

In Bank.

Petition by Ray L. Smith to review a recommendation by the Board of Governors of the State Bar of California for the suspension of petitioner as an attorney at law.

Recommendation modified, and petitioner suspended until January 1, 1931.

Ray L. Smith, of Los Angeles, in pro per.

George S. Dennison and Philbrick McCoy, both of Los Angeles, for State Bar of California.

PER CURIAM.

The petitioner herein has applied to this court for a review of the findings and decision of the board of governors of the State Bar of California recommending the suspension of this petitioner from practice as an attorney and counselor at law in this state for the period of fifteen months. Upon the filing of said application, an order was duly made requiring the certification of the record of the proceedings before the board of governors of the State Bar to this court, and, this having been done, and the matter having been argued, it has been submitted to us for decision.

On or about the 18th day of December, 1929, the Los Angeles Bar Association presented to the local administrative committee of the State Bar of California four separate complaints against the petitioner herein, charging him with various acts of professional misconduct and violations of the rules and regulations of the State Bar of California having reference to the professional conduct of the members thereof. In each of these complaints reference was made to a particular case in which the unprofessional acts and conduct charged against the accused were alleged to have occurred. These cases are referred to in the record transmitted to us as the "Benanti," "Taylor," "Grubb," and "Pena" cases. These are the names of persons who were parties plaintiff in the several personal damage actions, in the course and conduct of which the petitioner's professional misconduct is asserted. Upon the presentation of the aforesaid accusations, the petitioner was duly served with orders to show cause as to each before the local administrative committee of the State Bar; and on or about January 3, 1930, he appeared and filed his answers as to each of these accusations. In each of his said answers he specifically denied the commission of any acts of professional misconduct with respect to his engagement and professional services in each and all of said cases. The matter came on for consideration before the local administrative committee of the State Bar, which held several hearings thereon, in the course of which considerable testimony was adduced, and at the conclusion of which the said committee, on February 17, 1930, made and filed with the board of governors of the State Bar its findings and conclusions recommending that the accused be disbarred. Upon consideration of the matter as thus presented to the board of governors, the latter body, on April 19, 1930, adopted a resolution disagreeing in certain respects, to be hereinafter noted, with the findings of its local administrative committee, but recommending to the Supreme Court of California that the accused be suspended for the period of fifteen months, accompanying the same, however, with a further resolution "that the Board is largely influenced in not recommending a longer suspension or disbarment by the comparative youth and inexperience of the accused." Having been formally notified of the aforesaid action of the board of bar governors on May 10, 1930, the petitioner in due time presented to this court his application for a review of the foregoing proceedings and the recommendation based thereon of the board of bar governors of the State Bar as above set forth.

The facts of this matter as the same were developed at the hearing before the aforesaid committee of the State Bar may be summarized as follows: The petitioner, Raymond Lester Smith, was born on September 14, 1904, in Detroit, Mich., and grew up in that region. He was educated in the grammar schools of Youngstown, Ohio, attended Michigan University for a year, taking the academic courses, studied law in Southwestern University, graduating in 1927, when he came to California and shortly thereafter took the law examination and was admitted to practice in October, 1927. He was then of the age of twenty-three. His father was a retired lawyer who had not sought to be admitted to California. The young man began with desk room in the office of another attorney, and became one of the large and increasing list of young attorneys in search of a practice. Shortly thereafter he happened to meet a man named Lauden whom he had known several years before, and who, while living in Cleveland, Ohio, had been engaged in the business of a licensed adjuster, and who had recently come to California to engage in the same business, which, according to the frank admission both of himself and of the petitioner herein, was that of an "Ambulance Chaser." Upon arriving in California, Lauden adopted the fictitious name and style of "The Prudence Service Company," and seems to have filed and published the certificate required under the provisions of section 2466 et seq., of the Civil Code, of those persons or partnerships seeking to do business under fictitious names. He opened offices under that pretentious title, and apparently had several assistants of the class commonly known as "chasers." He required the services of an attorney, and, meeting this rather immature and inexperienced young lawyer, offered him the alluring retainer of $250 a month to become the regular attorney for "The Prudence Service Company." He seems to have told the young man that he had a license to do business as an "adjuster," although neither of them apparently knew of the existence of section 633e of the Political Code providing for the licensing of adjusters of a certain sort, but which section of the Political Code has no relation or application to the business, if it be such, of "ambulance chasing." The young man was glad to receive this assurance of a regular livelihood, and opened law offices of his own. His duties apparently were those of giving legal advice when required to his immediate employer, Lauden, or his assistants; to receive statements of the facts with regard to such damage cases as Lauden and his corps of assistants had procured through prompt interviews with persons injured, chiefly in automobile accidents, and from whom they had been able to obtain contracts authorizing the Prudence Service Company to undertake the settlement of the claims of such persons for damages, or to bring suits on their behalf in the courts for recovery upon such claims. The Prudence Service Company had quite an elaborate printed contract defining the terms of its employment, providing for a 50 per cent. contingent fee in the event of compromise or recovery in a legal action, and authorizing the company to employ attorneys to represent the claimant in the event such suits were to be brought and prosecuted. The only fee, however, which the young Smith was to receive for his legal services in any event was the sum of $250 a month from the Prudence Service Company.

When a "case" was sent up to his office with its accompanying memoranda, he drew the complaint and other papers required for the institution of the action, sent them to the office of the "Company," and had nothing further to do with the matter until the action having been filed under his name as attorney of record therein, he was supposed to assume charge of the case, interview for the first time the plaintiff and witnesses, and prepare for the trial of the case. The business prospered. Sometimes, as the record discloses, the young lawyer would be required to prepare as many as ten complaints in a single day. Many of these were never filed, the matters involved therein having been settled by the "Company," in which instances the lawyer heard nothing more of the case. Matters went on in this wise for a year or so, in the course of which the four cases above referred to arose and were finally selected by the Los Angeles Bar Association to form the gravamen of these four separate accusations to be laid before the local administrative committee of the State Bar. In the meantime rumbles of a growing agitation against the business of ambulance chasing and against the unethical practices of attorneys directly or individually engaged therein began to penetrate the understanding of the petitioner herein. He went, in the month of September, 1929, to attend the annual session of the State Bar held at Del Monte, where the subject was fully discussed, and where he very definitely learned that the sort of connection which he had been sustaining toward the business of ambulance chasing constituted a violation of certain rules of professional behavior which had already been promulgated by the board of governors of the State Bar. Smith came back from said meeting to Los Angeles, and very shortly thereafter began severing his relations with Lauden and the Prudence Service Company. Early in October, 1929, he addressed a letter to Lauden notifying him that beginning with January, 1930, he must obtain another lawyer; that between the date of said letter and January he (Smith) would not prepare or file any more personal injury complaints, but would only take care of such cases as had been commenced prior to his trip to Monterey. The petitioner appears to have carried out his purpose as outlined in his said letter, and ceased thenceforth accepting from Lauden or the Prudence Service Company, or from others, any ambulance chasing cases. The four cases referred to in the accusations against him were each and all cases which had arisen prior to October, 1929, and in each of which, with one exception, the petitioner's activities or participation had terminated prior to October, 1929.

Referring to these four cases more specifically, the evidence taken before the administrative committee discloses that as to the Benanti case the accident in which Mrs. Benanti's minor son was injured occurred July 15, 1929. Lauden either directly or through one of his agents, solicited the case, and procured from Mrs. Benanti her signature to one of the contracts of the Prudence Service Company. A complaint was prepared by the petitioner herein upon the statement of the case sent him by the company, but without any meeting or previous interview with the client, and which complaint was sent to the office of the Prudence Service Company for verification and filing and for the issuance of a summons thereon, which, when issued and served, was to be returned to the office of the petitioner. This complaint was filed but never served, for the reason that two or three days thereafter Mrs. Benanti wrote a letter to the Prudence Service Company requesting it to withdraw from the case, and that another attorney named Irving be substituted in place of the petitioner in the case, which substitution was sent to the petitioner's office and signed, and he heard nothing more about the case until the service of the accusation of the Bar Association upon him. It appears, however, that there were certain irregularities in the verification of the complaint before filing, the name of Mrs. Benanti having been forged thereto, but of this the petitioner asserts that he knew nothing, but the administrative committee made a finding upon evidence which seems to us to be quite insufficient that the petitioner filed the complaint in the Benanti case knowing that the verification and signature of Mrs. Benanti thereto had been forged.

In the Taylor case the accident to her occurred on February 19, 1929. A day or two later Mr. Lauden solicited her case and offered her a contract which she signed. The petitioner prepared a complaint in this case also without having seen Mrs. Taylor and which was sent to the company for verification and filing, and which complaint was filed but not served. A few days later a settlement was made by the company acting on behalf of Mrs. Taylor for the sum of $100, of which she received $54, which was satisfactory to her, and the case was dismissed. It was claimed upon the hearing that there were some irregularities as to the verification of the complaint in this case also, but the administrative committee made a finding upon no sufficient evidence whatever that the petitioner had filed the complaint in the Taylor case knowing that Mrs. Taylor's verification and signature thereto were forgeries. In the Grubb case, when the witnesses were about to be called before the administrative committee, the petitioner offered a stipulation to the effect that this case was also solicited by the Prudence Service Company and was referred to the petitioner as in the other cases, and that a complaint was prepared by him and subsequently filed by the company, and that the case came on for hearing before the Superior Court, at which time the petitioner appeared representing the plaintiff, whereupon a settlement was made and approved by the court and the case dismissed. In the Pena case the accident occurred to Mrs. Pena on July 5, 1929. The case was solicited by one of the agents of Lauden or the Prudence Service Company on the following day, when the usual contract was signed. The petitioner prepared the complaint in the customary way, and the same was filed on July 12, 1929, and, no settlement having been made, the case was still pending trial at the time of the hearing before the administrative committee. Some effort was made at the hearing to show that the verification in this case was also forged, but the committee made no specific finding upon the subject.

With respect to the above several falsifications and forgeries as to the verifications of the complaints in the foregoing cases, it was made to appear that there was a man named Raspon in the employ of the Prudence Service Company as an ambulance chaser and that it was probably this man who wrote the names of the several plaintiffs to the verifications of these complaints and who procured a complacent notary to affix his certificate thereto. Raspon at the time of the hearing had disappeared. The petitioner denied in each instance that he knew of or had participated in Raspon's nefarious acts and conduct in the foregoing regard, and the evidence, fairly considered, fails to fix a stigma upon the petitioner in the foregoing regard. The main gravamen of the several accusations against the petitioner and of the affidavits offered in support thereof consist in the charge and proof that a year or so prior to the filing of the charges against him by and on behalf of the Los Angeles Bar Association he had accepted regular employment from Lauden, doing business under the fictitious name of the Prudence Service Company, knowing him to have formerly been, and to being then, engaged in the business of soliciting damage cases as an ambulance chaser; and to have during the year succeeding his said employment prepared complaints and other papers for filing in such cases without seeing or consulting with the parties on whose behalf actions were to be brought, or having any other relation to or contact with such parties than that resulting from his agreement to act as an attorney representing the Prudence Service Company for a specified monthly retainer. The petitioner freely admitted, and now and here admits, the truth of these accusations, and offers in defense, or rather in mitigation, thereof that at the time he accepted employment from the Prudence Service Company, knowing that its main business activities were those of soliciting employment as adjusters of damages in accident cases through the means of what has come in common parlance to be known as "ambulance chasing," he honestly believed the same to be a legitimate employment, that his monthly retainer therein was honestly and fully earned, and that he continued in such belief until he attended the annual meeting of the State Bar held at Del Monte in September, 1929, and there and in the discussions held thereat he first came to realize that his relations with the aforesaid ambulance-chasing institution and with the persons operating under the name thereof were being frowned upon as unethical by the organized bar of California, and that upon returning from said convention he took immediate steps to sever such relation, and had practically done so prior to the presentation of the aforesaid accusations against him.

Upon the conclusion of the hearing before the local administrative committee of the State Bar, certain findings of fact were made and filed by that body, accompanying the recommendation of three of its five members that the petitioner should be disbarred. The committee found that it was not true that the accused had employed either Louden or the Prudence Service Company to solicit or obtain professional employment for him, and that the accused had not remunerated either of the above parties for soliciting and obtaining professional employment for him. The committee further found that it was not true that the accused had shared with any unlicensed person or persons compensation arising out of or as an incident to his professional services and conduct, and that it was not true that the accused had aided or abetted an unlicensed person or persons to practice law or to receive compensation therefrom. The committee, however, found that it was true that the accused had knowingly accepted professional employment on behalf of the several claimants in personal injury cases whose names are above set forth, and which employment was offered to him as a result of, or as an incident to, the activities of an unlicensed person, who for compensation controlled, directed, or influenced such employment. The foregoing findings of the committee relate to the alleged violation by the accused of rule III of the rules of professional conduct by the board of bar governors of the State Bar and approved by the Supreme Court of California on May 24, 1928. The committee further found that the accused had been guilty of violating rule X thereof, which provides that "a member of The State Bar shall not advise the commencement, prosecution or defense of a case unless he has been consulted in reference thereto, except when his relation to a party or a subject matter is such as to make it proper for him so to do." The specific respect in which the accused was alleged and found to have violated this rule of professional conduct consisted in the fact that he had in the four instances above stated prepared the pleadings and other papers for the commencement of an action on behalf of each without having seen or consulted with the respective parties for whom he was to appear as attorney of record in the actions to be commenced, and which were actually commenced, on behalf of each of these. As to the other findings which the aforesaid committee made herein, we are satisfied from a careful examination of the record that they are not sufficiently sustained by the evidence, and that the gravamen of the case against the accused herein consists in the extent to which the committee found him to have been guilty of violating rules III and X. The petitioner upon his hearing before the committee and also upon his final hearing before the board of bar governors of the State Bar freely admitted his violation of these rules, but pleaded his youth, ignorance, and inexperience in extenuation thereof, and also pleaded and showed that when, upon his attendance at the Del Monte convention, his eyes had been opened to the extent of his offending, he had immediately severed his connection with his former employer, Louden, or the Prudence Service Company, refusing as early as October, 1929, to accept any more ambulance chasing cases, and only retaining his connection with such actions as had actually been commenced until such time as these should be concluded, or as the parties interested therein could secure other counsel.

In finally passing upon this matter, the board of bar governors, while disagreeing with certain of the findings of its committee which were favorable to the accused, concluded to recommend a suspension of the petitioner for the period of fifteen months, basing their action in so doing and in thus softening the harsher recommendation of the administrative committee upon "the comparative youth and inexperience of the accused." We are of the opinion that the board of bar governors might well have taken into consideration in fixing the aforesaid penalty that this was a test case, being one of the first cases of like character brought before said board for investigation, and involving as it did the activities of ambulance chasers and the ethical relation and duties of members of the legal profession toward those who, not being themselves licensed attorneys, were largely engaging in that sort of discredited but apparently lucrative occupation; and that the said board might well also have considered in mitigation of the penalty to be imposed upon this petitioner that he had, apparently in good faith and some months prior to the accusations made against him, severed his connection with his ambulance chasing employer and practically ended his connection with the cases concerning which specifically these accusations have been made.

Under the foregoing circumstances we are disposed to the view that this young man has been sufficiently disciplined, and, having voluntarily suspended himself from the active practice of the law as of the date March 1, 1930, in conformity with the recommendation of the board of bar governors of the State Bar, it is therefore hereby ordered that the period of his suspension as recommended by the board of governors of the State Bar be so far shortened as to expire on January 1, 1931; and that said Ray L. Smith shall be, and he is hereby, as of the date of January 1, 1931, restored to the position of attorney and counselor at law of and in the state of California, and to full membership in the State Bar of California, subject to the rules and regulations of that body.

LANGDON, J.

I dissent. I am in accord with the majority opinion, except as to the judgment therein pronounced. The appropriate judgment, based on that opinion, is a dismissal of all charges against petitioner.

Upon the record, no other judgment seems warranted. This young man committed no crime, and this court so holds. Nevertheless, a local administrative committee of the State Bar stigmatized him as a criminal and recommended his disbarment. The board of governors of the State Bar disapproved the local committee's report, and reduced the punishment to suspension for fifteen months. Of the fifteen members of the board, only eight signed the order; two members dissented; and five were either absent or did not vote. This court disapproves the recommendation of the board, and further reduces the suspension to nine months; but its judgment nevertheless leaves the stain of suspension upon his record.

Does the punishment fit the offense? It is based on violations of rules III and X of the Rules of Professional Conduct of the State Bar. No moral turpitude confronts us in this case. The most that can be urged against petitioner is an unfortunate association and an error in judgment and interpretation on a question which has been highly debatable. With reference to rule III, in a situation akin to this, the State Bar committee on legal ethics ruled that the conduct complained of here was not improper. This ruling was later withdrawn, but the point is that, if the elders of the bar were perplexed by this ethical problem, is it not unreasonable to hold a mere fledgling in the law to a correct interpretation at his peril? With reference to rule X, on advising the commencement of actions without being consulted in reference thereto, petitioner believed that in dealing with his employer, Lauden, as the agent of the plaintiffs, he was well within the rule. While this rule is a salutary one, its strict provisions have been honored more in the breach than in the observance in many of the larger offices of this state. It is said to be a not uncommon practice for lawyers for banks, trust companies, insurance companies, automobile associations, and as correspondents of foreign attorneys, to prepare and file papers without direct contact with parties in interest. I do not condone this procedure, but, judging from petitioner's attitude as disclosed by the record, if his attention had been called to these irregularities in his conduct, he would have promptly discontinued them. A mere suggestion of change in practice would have been sufficient. But no intimation or warning was ever given to this young man by any member or officer of the State Bar that his activities were questionable.

Both the board and this court have overlooked or disregarded the really important feature of this case. The outstanding constructive accomplishment of the State Bar since its organization, which in itself is sufficient to justify the experiment of a self-governing bar, is the corrective influence it has had over its membership through educational methods alone. Smith attended the Del Monte meeting of the State Bar. He heard there a denunciation of activities similar to those in which he had been engaged. Immediately upon his return, he announced to his employer that he would accept no more cases from him, but would only dispose of the unfinished business. Thereafter he completely severed his relations with Lauden, relinquishing a salary of $250 per month. No charge had been made against him, but he voluntarily discontinued a profitable employment. To some of us this action may seem commonplace, but to this struggling young lawyer it meant starting anew. To the practitioner who can look back to the starvation period of the beginner, the action of this young man appears highly commendable. If, through education, the State Bar can induce its members voluntarily to clean house, its disciplinary powers need seldom be invoked. They were not called for in this case. Their purpose had already been fully achieved by this courageous step which petitioner had taken. We should not ignore this significant act. No parallel situation has yet been presented to this court.

There can be no justification for tarnishing this young man's name by a disciplinary judgment, unless it may serve to help him or others. He needed no help; he had voluntarily abandoned the activities which were frowned upon. With ten thousand lawyers in this state, and with ambulance chasing in one form or another a familiar practice for at least the last quarter of a century, this youth less than two years admitted to the bar was made the subject of a test case. I think that he is an unfortunate victim of the war against ambulance chasing, a war that must go on until the practice is eliminated, but, in this campaign, the guns might first be trained on the giants, instead of the pignies. . . I agree with the majority that the petitioner has been sufficiently punished; but I think that justice can only be done by dismissing the charges and clearing his name.

1. Sales ☞234(3).

If seller of property other than negotiable instrument has no title, buyer in good faith and for full value obtains no title.

2. Bonds ☞74.

Bond reciting unconditional promise to pay was not nonnegotiable because of conditions in trust indenture securing it (Civ. Code, § 3082, and § 3265 as amended by St. 1923, p. 193).

The bond, which was unregistered when purloined from owner's safety deposit box, undertook to pay to bearer, or to the registered owner, if bond be registered, or to trustee under trust indenture, $1,000, and recited that it was a negotiable instrument. Negotiability was not destroyed by the numerous conditions recited in trust indenture because Civ. Code, § 3265, as amended by St. 1923, p. 193, provides that negotiability of promissory note otherwise negotiable in form secured by mortgage or deed of trust shall not be affected because of statement therein that it is so secured, nor by any conditions contained in mortgage or deed of trust securing it.

PRESTON, J.

The complaint alleges conversion of a security denominated a Spring Valley bond in the principal sum of $1,000. Defendant answered with a general denial. The court made findings and gave judgment in its favor. Plaintiff has appealed upon the judgment roll. The facts are not in dispute.

The case turns upon the question of whether the bond in suit is or is not a negotiable instrument within the meaning of the law merchant as disclosed by our negotiable instruments statute and supplementary enactments. The facts necessary to grasp the questions involved will now be set forth:

Plaintiff owned said bond in December, 1925, and kept it in a safe deposit box in a bank at Burlingame, Cal., to which box he allowed one Hirschman, with the bank's consent, to have access and to keep therein his own valuable papers. Hirschman, however, without the authority, consent, or knowledge of plaintiff, extracted said bond from said box and sold it. In other words, he purloined the bond. After several transfers it was finally purchased by defendant on January 5, 1926, in good faith and for full value at a time when neither the bond itself nor any coupon thereon had matured.

[1] It will be seen at once that unless the bond is a negotiable instrument, Hirschman could, by transfer and delivery, convey no greater title than he himself had. The general rule is that the seller of property can transfer to the buyer no better title than he has himself, and if at the time of the transfer he has no title, the purchaser, although buying in good faith and for full value obtains no title. Popp v. Exchange Bank, 189 Cal. 296, 208 P. 113; Crocker Bank v. Byrne & McDonnell, 178 Cal. 329, 332, 173 P. 752. But if the instrument is negotiable within the meaning of the law merchant, such a purchaser is protected.

In this connection certain provisions of the bond and the trust indenture securing it should be noted. The bond was one of an authorized issue of twenty-two million dollars, bearing date of May 1, 1923, due in twenty years and issued by the Spring Valley Water Company, the first interest coupon maturing May 1, 1926; it was negotiated September 27, 1923. It undertakes to "pay to the bearer hereof, or to the registered owner hereof if this bond be registered, or to the trustee under the trust indenture hereinafter mentioned, one thousand dollars, * * *" and with further reference to the trust indenture, it recites that it is secured "by a trust indenture of even date herewith executed and delivered by the company to Union Trust Company of San Francisco * * * as trustee of the trusts therein declared, * * * and reference is made to the trust indenture for a description of the property conveyed and mortgaged, for the nature and extent of the security, the rights of the holders of said bonds thereunder and the terms and conditions upon which said bonds are issued and secured.

The trust indenture itself recites: " * * * In the event the City and County of San Francisco should become the purchaser of all or substantially all of the property conveyed by said trust indenture and assume the payment of the said bond, the company should be released from all liability thereafter to accrue thereon; that in case the company should make default in any of its covenants and conditions prescribed in said bond or in said trust indenture, then the trustee may and upon the written request of the holders of 25 per cent. in aggregate principal amount of all bonds then outstanding shall declare the principal of and accrued interest upon said bonds to be due and payable immediately, and upon such declaration the same should become and be immediately due and payable, provided, that if all arrears of interest upon said bonds and the expenses and charges of the trustee shall be paid by the company and default in the observance or performance of said bonds and said trust indenture shall have been made good, the holders of a majority in principal amount of the bonds outstanding could waive such default and obtain from the trustee a rescission of such declaration of maturity, also that in case the company should make default in any of the respects aforesaid the trustee should be entitled to sell the trust estate and apply the proceeds in the manner provided in said trust indenture, also that no holder of any bond should have the right to institute any suit, action or proceedings upon or in respect to said trust indenture or have any other remedy thereunder or thereupon or under or upon said bond unless the holder shall have previously given the trustee written notice of an existing default, nor unless also the holders of at least 25 per cent. in aggregate principal amount of all bonds then outstanding shall have requested the trustee in writing to take action in respect of such default and the trustee shall have declined to take such action or shall have failed so to do within thirty days thereafter."

[2] Appellant contends that the negotiability of said instrument is destroyed by reason of the several above noted provisions of said bond and said trust indenture. Respondent replies that its negotiability is made conclusive by reason of the provisions of the act of 1921 (Stats. 1921, p. 471), as follows: "Bonds payable to bearer or holder shall be negotiable, notwithstanding any condition contained therein or in the mortgage, deed of trust or other instrument securing the same."

We think that the instrument, whatever its proper name, is embraced within the provisions of section 3265 of the Civil Code and under the test there set forth is a negotiable instrument. This section in its original form was a part of the uniform Negotiable Instruments Law adopted in California in 1917 (Stats. 1917, p. 1532). In 1923, however (Stats. 1923, p. 193), and subsequent to the 1921 legislation, this section was amended to read as follows: "A negotiable promissory note within the meaning of this title is an unconditional promise in writing made by one person to another, signed by the maker, engaging to pay on demand, or at a fixed or determinable future time, a sum certain in money to order or to bearer but the negotiability of a promissory note otherwise negotiable in form, secured by a mortgage or deed of trust upon real or personal property shall not be affected or abridged by reason of a statement therein that it is so secured, nor by reason of the fact that said instrument is so secured nor by any conditions contained in the mortgage or deed of trust securing the same. * * *"

The instrument in suit on its face is an unconditional promise to pay, signed by the maker, engaging to pay at a fixed future time to bearer, a sum of money. In other words, it is negotiable in form. Section 3082, Civ. Code.

The conditions complained of are not in the instrument itself, but in the trust indenture securing it. But the above section plainly provides that where the instrument on its face is negotiable, such negotiability is not destroyed by "any conditions contained in the mortgage or deed of trust securing the same." We know of no reason upon which to question the efficacy of this amendment to the statute. Moreover, the instrument itself declares its negotiability. The effect of the provision allowing registration is not involved, as the instrument here in question was not registered.

The judgment is affirmed.

BRANDON v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT
COMMISSION et al.

S. F. 13926.

Supreme Court of California.

Jan. 8, 1931.

Master and servant Ⓒ405(4).

Finding that perforation of stomach ulcer causing death was not caused or exacerbated by muscular exertion in course of employment held justified.

In Bank.

Proceedings under the Workmen's Compensation Act by Albert W. Brandon, guardian ad litem and trustee of John Lynd and others, opposed by the State Compensation Insurance Fund, and the Old Gold Mining Company. The Industrial Accident Commission denied compensation, and claimant applied for certiorari.

Order affirmed.

A. Boyer, of Bridgeport, for petitioner.

Edward O. Allen, of San Francisco, for respondents.

LANGDON, J.

Petitioner, as guardian ad litem of the minor dependents of James Lynd, deceased, seeks to review an order of the Industrial Accident Commission denying compensation for the death of said deceased.

James Lynd was employed as a miner by the Old Gold Mining Company at Bodie, Cal. He claimed to have suffered severe pain from lifting a heavy ore car about September 9, 1928. He continued to work, however, until September 11, 1928, when he attempted to pull a bell rope and collapsed. He was assisted to his home, where he was attended by a local doctor. The following day he was removed to a hospital under the care of another doctor. Subsequently he was taken to the University of California Hospital at San Francisco, where he died on December 15, 1928. The autopsy established the cause of death as peritonitis following a perforation of a duodenal ulcer. Although testimony was presented on behalf of petitioner that the deceased had never been sick, the deceased, himself, in the words of his doctor's report, "gave a previous history of hyperacidity of the stomach and upper abdominal indigestion." In addition to this, the autopsy of Dr. Reinhardt showed several other duodenal ulcers partially healed.

The sole question is whether the admitted cause of the death, namely, the perforation of a stomach ulcer, was a result of muscular exertion in the course of the employment of the deceased. The only significant evidence is that of the attending physicians and other medical experts, which evidence is in substantial conflict. The first attending physician was of the opinion that the cause of the ruptured ulcer was a severe muscular strain. He says in his report: "It rarely happens that such an ulcer will break except when the party is under some severe strain." The same doctor, however, originally diagnosed the injury incorrectly as a partial hernia. The other attending physician was of the same opinion as to the cause of the rupture, but he also, in a subsequent letter, raised the question "whether or not this whole matter may not be a diaphragmatic hernia." In support of the commission's finding is the report of Dr. Newman, medical director of the state compensation insurance fund, and the opinion of Dr. Boardman, who states: "Perforation is one of the regular occurring complications of peptic ulcers. * * * It may occur under all sorts of conditions, rest, activity, full stomach or empty stomach, etc." Dr. Harbaugh, after reviewing all of the evidence, concludes: "I do not feel primarily, however, that the condition could be considered in the light of an industrial accident."

It is obvious that the above evidence presents a question of fact upon which the finding of the commission is conclusive. That the perforation of the ulcer caused the death is not doubted; but whether this perforation occurred as a result of muscular strain or wholly apart from the deceased's occupation is purely a matter of expert opinion. No direct evidence on this point was available. Consequently the opinions of the two doctors who attended the patient have no special significance by reason of this fact, particularly in view of their erroneous diagnoses. The evidence permits the inference that the rupture was the normal result of a continuous process of ulceration. The commission weighed the various opinions and concluded that "the evidence fails to establish that the death of James Lynd on December 13, 1928, was caused or exacerbated by injury arising out of and in the course of said employment." Upon the record we can only accept this conclusion and affirm the order. See Walter v. Industrial Accident Commission (Cal. Sup.) 289 P. 627; Bethlehem S. Corp. v. Industrial Accident Commission, 181 Cal. 500, 183 P. 179, 7 A. L. R. 1180.

The order is affirmed.

CORNBLITH v. VALENTINE et ux.

L. A. 10465.

Supreme Court of California.

Dec. 31, 1930.

1. Appeal and error ⇨1071(1).

Where both parties relied upon agreement and judgment was based upon it, patent error, in findings contrary to evidence, to effect that no written agreement had been executed, held harmless.

2. Specific performance ⇨49(2).

In actions for specific performance, mere inadequacy of consideration is sufficient to deny relief (Civ. Code, § 3391, subs. 1, 2).

3. Specific performance ⇨121(8).

In action for specific performance of agreement to exchange real property, evidence sustained finding of inadequacy of consideration.

Evidence disclosed that plaintiff's equity had net value of $4,100, while that of defendants had net value of $6,200.

4. Specific performance ⇨53.

Contract will not be specifically enforced, where obtained by misrepresentations (Civ. Code, § 3391, subd. 3).

5. Specific performance ⇨123.

Findings that defendants were induced to enter exchange agreement by fraudulent representations and that consideration was inadequate were sufficient to sustain judgment denying specific performance.

6. Specific performance ⇨121(3).

In action for specific performance of contract to exchange real property, finding that defendants suffered damage in sum of $250 by plaintiff's possession of defendants' premises held supported by evidence.

The evidence disclosed that plaintiff was in possession of defendants' premises for period of over five months, and that reasonable rental value of premises was $57 per month.

7. Specific performance ⇨130.

In specific performance suit, where defendants' answer alleged plaintiffs were in wrongful possession of defendants' premises, court could render affirmative judgment for defendants, though defendants did not file cross-complaint or counterclaim.

8. Pleading ⇨4.

It is not what pleading is called, but facts alleged, that determine its character.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; W. A. Anderson, Judge.

Action by Henry Cornblith against Charles Gilmer Valentine and wife. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Lester C. Thorne, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Charles C. Jones, and John L. Bland, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

PER CURIAM.

This is an action for specific performance of an agreement to exchange real property. It appears that on October 4, 1926, plaintiff was the owner of an equity in certain improved real property in Hermosa Beach, and the defendants were the owners of an equity in certain improved real property elsewhere in Los Angeles county. On that date, the parties, by an agreement in writing, agreed to exchange their respective equities; each party to assume certain designated incumbrances. The amended complaint alleges full compliance with this agreement on the part of plaintiff, and alleges the failure and refusal of defendants to perform. In addition to asking for a decree of specific performance, plaintiff asks for $500 damages, alleged to have been caused by defendant's delay in performance.

The answer first denies the execution of the contract and all of the other material allegations of the amended complaint, and in addition thereto, by way of affirmative defense, admitting the execution of the contract and the escrow, alleges the inadequacy of the consideration, and also alleges, in proper form, that defendants were induced to enter into the agreement by reason of certain false and fraudulent representations of plaintiff. The answer further alleges that plaintiff was in wrongful possession of defendants' property for a period of over five months, and that during that period collected the rentals thereof; that the reasonable rental value of the premises during the period of wrongful occupation was $300; that while plaintiff was in possession of the premises he injured the real property of defendants to the extent of $300. In the prayer of the answer, in addition to asking that plaintiff take nothing by his action, defendants ask for damages in the sum of $600.

On the issues thus joined, the cause was tried by the court sitting without a jury. The trial court rendered judgment in favor of defendants, not only denying to plaintiff the relief sought, but also granting defendants damages in the sum of $250. Among other things, the trial court found that the equity of plaintiff was not equal in value to that of defendant, and that therefore the consideration was inadequate, and that the contract was not just, fair, or equitable to defendants. The court also found that defendants had been induced to enter the agreement by reason of certain false and fraudulent representations made by plaintiff. These representations which the court found were false and fraudulent and upon which defendants relied, were that the equity of plaintiff was equal in value to that of defendants; that plaintiff would convey to defendants all of the furniture in one of the houses; that a designated mortgage was the only incumbrance against plaintiff's property. The court found that plaintiff knew the equities were not equal in value; that shortly after entering into the agreement plaintiff carried away the furniture that he had agreed to convey and has ever since concealed and refused to deliver the same; that there were other incumbrances against the property than the one designated.

On this appeal plaintiff makes two main contentions: (1) The evidence does not support the findings; (2) the judgment in favor of defendants in the sum of $250 is not only not supported by the evidence, but the court was without power to render the same for the reason that there are not proper pleadings in the nature of a cross-complaint or counterclaim upon which the same could be based.

[1] In reference to the first contention, little need be said. It is true that the trial court made a series of findings to the effect that no written agreement had been entered into, and that no escrow had been opened and that defendants had not cancelled the escrow instructions, and other preliminary and immaterial findings. It is likewise true that these findings are not supported by the evidence, being in fact contrary thereto, and obviously, through inadvertence, were copied from the answer and should not have been inserted, but as both sides necessarily rely upon the agreement of exchange and the court's judgment for either party must necessarily be based upon it, and its existence is conceded by the findings, no prejudice arises from the patent error. On the two vital issues the court, on sharply conflicting evidence, found in favor of defendants. These findings, as already set forth, were that the contract was unfair to defendants, and that the plaintiff was guilty of fraud and deceit.

[2, 3] On the issue of inadequacy of the consideration, the evidence most favorable to the defendants was that plaintiff's equity had a net value of $4,100, while that of defendants had a net value of $6,200. It is elementary that in actions for specific performance mere inadequacy of consideration, of itself, is sufficient to deny this relief. Civ. Code, § 3391, subds. 1 and 2. It has been held that a difference of $1,000 in value in a $14,000 transaction is sufficient to deny this relief. Wilson

v. White, 161 Cal. 453, 119 P. 895. In this case the evidence was more than sufficient to sustain the finding. This finding alone is sufficient to sustain the judgment.

[4, 5] In reference to the finding of fraud, the evidence may not be as clear as might be desired, but there is sufficient evidence to sustain the finding. It is well settled that a contract will not be specifically enforced if the defendant's assent "was given under the influence of mistake, misapprehension, or surprise" (Civ. Code, § 3391, subd. 4); or if his assent "was obtained by the misrepresentation, concealment, circumvention, or unfair practices of any party to whom performance would become due under the contract, or by any promise of such party which has not been substantially fulfilled" (Civ. Code, § 3391, subd. 3).

These two findings, supported as they are by the evidence, are sufficient to sustain the judgment. They were the vital ones in this action, one or either of them being sufficient to deny the relief. The error of the trial court in making the findings which were not material to the issue is of no importance, and should be disregarded.

[6-8] The finding that defendants suffered damage in the sum of $250 is likewise supported by ample evidence. The evidence indicated that plaintiff was in possession of defendants' premises for a period of over five months, and that the reasonable rental value of the premises was $57 per month. This evidence alone is sufficient to sustain the finding of damage in the sum of $250. Appellant contends, however, that the trial court was without power to render such an affirmative judgment in defendants' favor for the reason that defendants did not file a cross-complaint or counterclaim. In this regard appellant cites and relies on such cases as Doyle v. Franklin, 40 Cal. 106; McDougald v. Argonaut Land Co., 117 Cal. 87, 48 P. 1021; Brannan v. Paty, 58 Cal. 330. We do not deem those cases in point. At most, they hold that where matter is set up by way of defense only, with no prayer for affirmative relief, such pleading cannot be used as the basis for granting affirmative relief. But that is not the situation here presented. In paragraphs VIII and IX of the second separate and further defense of the answer of defendants it is clearly alleged that plaintiffs were in wrongful possession of the premises of defendants for over five months; that during that period plaintiff collected all the rents; that the reasonable value of such use and occupation was $60 a month, all to defendants' damage in the sum of $300. It is also clearly alleged that during plaintiff's occupation he damaged the premises to the extent of $300. In the prayer of the answer, based on the above allegations, defendants asked for judgment in the sum of $600. Plaintiff did not demur specially to this part of the answer, nor did he move to strike any part therefrom. At the trial plaintiff did not object to any of the evidence offered by defendants to prove these allegations. Although it would undoubtedly have been better pleading to have set forth the above matter in a pleading entitled a counterclaim or cross-complaint, the rule is well settled that it is not what a pleading is called but the facts that it sets up that determine its character. In McDougald v. Hulet, 132 Cal. 154, at page 160, 64 P. 278, 280, the rule is stated as follows:

"We do not think it necessary to go into any nice distinctions as to the name given to the answer. Plaintiff, by bringing the defendant Boggs into court and asking the court to find the amount due, and by allowing the court to pass upon the issue as though properly made, is estopped from now claiming that the matter was not the subject of a counterclaim. He will not be allowed to thus lull his adversary into repose until his claim is barred by the statute, and then raise a point which is lethal.

"It is not what a pleading is called, but the facts which it sets up, that determines its character. Its character and sufficiency will be determined by the court from the facts alleged in it."

The foregoing reasoning appeals to us as applicable here.

The judgment is affirmed.

Charles C. Montgomery, Richard F. Bailey, Hal Hughes, Vincent Morgan, and Hill & Morgan, all of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Thatcher J. Kemp, of Los Angeles, for respondent State Bar of California.

PER CURIAM.

This is a proceeding to review the findings and the recommendation of the board of governors of the State Bar of California that the petitioner be disbarred from the practice of the law in all the courts of this state.

The decision of the board and of the local committee is claimed to be erroneous on the ground that the State Bar Act (St. 1927, p. 38, as amended) violates section 13, article 1, of the California state Constitution, in that the proceedings provided by it do not constitute due process of law and that the act violates certain sections of the United States Constitution or amendments thereto. It is also contended that certain findings of the board of governors and of the local committee are outside of any issue tendered by the pleadings, and that the evidence is insufficient to support the findings.

[1-3] We may at the outset remove from consideration the first ground presented, inasmuch as the questions attempted to be raised thereby have been settled adversely to the petitioner's contentions. State Bar v. Superior Court, 207 Cal. 323, 278 P. 432; In re Cate, 207 Cal. 443, 279 P. 131; Matter of Shattuck, 208 Cal. 6, 279 P. 998; Matter of Richardson and Elconin (Cal. Sup.) 288 P. 669. In this connection the petitioner also claims that his rights were violated by reason of the fact that over his objection he was compelled to testify and submit to cross-examination at the instance of the local committee. The contention in this regard is made that the proceeding before the local committee is in the nature of a criminal proceeding wherein a defendant may not be compelled to testify against his will. While this ground of objection appears to have been waived before the committee, it may nevertheless be said that it is fully met by the decision in the case of In re Vaughan, 189 Cal. 491, 209 P. 353, 355, 24 A. L. R. 858, wherein the same contention was answered by the statement that: "This position cannot be maintained. Although it has been held that an accusation is in the nature of a criminal charge (Matter of Haymond, 121 Cal. 385, 53 P. 899) and that a proceeding on such a charge is a quasi-criminal action (In re McCowan, 177 Cal. 93, 170 P. 1100) 'this court has uniformly treated disbarment proceedings as peculiar to themselves, and governed exclusively by the code sections specifically covering them.' Matter of Danford, 157 Cal. 425, 108 P. 322. The purpose of such a proceeding is to determine the fitness of an officer of the court to continue in that capacity, and it has been said the disbarment of attorneys is not intended for the punishment of the individual, but for the protection of the courts and the legal profession. Ex parte Finley, 97 S. C. 37, 81 S. E. 279." It is also contended that the committee erred in calling the petitioner's stenographer over his objection in violation of section 1881 of the Code of Civil Procedure, providing that an attorney's secretary, stenographer, or clerk may not be examined, without the consent of his employer, concerning any fact the knowledge of which has been acquired in such capacity. The record discloses that the stenographer was not examined as to any fact the knowledge of which was acquired in her capacity as the petitioner's stenographer, but was, in fact, examined in her capacity and in relation to transactions in which she participated or of which she had knowledge by virtue of her capacity as the secretary of the Mayer Investment Company.

Neither do we perceive any merit in the second ground presented. While the findings were not drawn to follow the language of the accusations and allegations contained in the verified complaint filed with the committee, nevertheless those objected to were related or were collateral to the main issues. The record shows that one amendment to the complaint was made during the course of the hearing, the evidence as to which the petitioner was given ample opportunity to meet. It also appears that the committee consistently ruled out and refrained from considering any offers of inadmissible evidence, and based its conclusions on legal evidence alone, and that the rights of the petitioner, as defined by the decision in Matter of Richardson and Elconin (Cal. Sup.) 288 P. 669, to a decision of the committee and the board based on competent and legal evidence, have not been violated.

[4] The remaining contention is whether the evidence is sufficient to support the findings and the conclusions reached by the board of governors.

The petitioner was admitted to practice law at the bar of this state in 1917, and at the time of the hearing in this matter was pursuing the practice of the law in the city of Los Angeles. The complainant before the local committee, Mildred M. Sutliff, is the daughter of James B. Mayer, who in his lifetime created and became the principal stockholder and officer of the Mayer Investment Company, a California corporation. James B. Mayer died on October 5, 1923, and left surviving him his daughter, Mildred M. Sutliff, and two sons, Jay Mayer, an adult and full brother of Mildred, and James B. Mayer, Jr., at that time nine years of age, a half brother of Mildred and Jay. Prior to James B. Mayer's death the petitioner had been acting as attorney for the Mayer Investment Company.

On October 11, 1923, Mildred M. Sutliff filed a petition for letters of administration on her father's estate, on which application the petitioner acted as her attorney. She also in the same month filed a petition for letters of guardianship of the person and estate of James B. Mayer, Jr., also on this application being represented by the petitioner. The latter estate consisted mainly of the proceeds of a $4,000 insurance policy on his father's life of which James B. Mayer, Jr., was the beneficiary. The petitioner continued to act as the attorney for the Mayer Investment Company.

On October 10, 1923, the petitioner and C. N. Hayes, an uncle of Mildred M. Sutliff, were appointed trustees of the Mayer Investment Company, with a power of attorney to transact its business, and they continued as such trustees until their discharge by the directors in June, 1924. In the latter month, or prior thereto, the petitioner became a stockholder of the company. On June 27, 1924, a directors' meeting was held in which, among the first order of business, the board elected the petitioner and C. N. Hayes as directors to fill vacancies caused by directors resigning. The petitioner was present and participated at this meeting. Practically the next order of business as shown by the minutes was the election of the petitioner as treasurer of the company. About the last order of business of the meeting was a discussion of a bill of $6,500 for services as attorney and as trustee rendered by the petitioner, over which there had been some dispute and protest, and a settlement thereof by the adoption of the following resolution:

"Whereas in the opinion of the directors of the Mayer Investment Company, it is for the best interests of the company that the regular officers assume active management, control and operation of its affairs, Be It Resolved, That the trustees, Frazier McIntosh and C. N. Hayes, be and are hereby released from all authority and obligation vested in them as trustees, and Be It Further Resolved, That the Power of Attorney granted the trustees, be and hereby is terminated, and that the future operation of the company's affairs be through the regular officers of the company as set forth in the by-laws. Be It Further Resolved, That Mr. McIntosh's bill of $6,500 be approved, same to be payment in full for services to date as trustee and attorney for the company, which amount is to be paid as follows: $1,250 at the end of this meeting, $250 on the first of January, 1925, and $5,000 on or before three years from date, no interest to be paid on said $5,000."

A resolution was also adopted changing the company's principal place of business from Los Angeles to Corcoran, Cal. An additional resolution was passed that the petitioner be continued as the attorney for the company to serve without charge except in case of a suit. The sum of $1,500 was paid pursuant to the foregoing resolution.

Subsequent to the time when Mildred M. Sutliff was appointed administratrix of the estate of her father and guardian of the estate of her brother, and while the petitioner was acting as the attorney and cotrustee for the Mayer Investment Company, and upon the petitioner's advice and suggestion and with his consent and approval, $4,000 cash from the minor's estate was loaned to the Mayer Investment Company, and a mortgage on a crop of cotton executed by the company was given as security therefor. No permission to make this loan, nor any approval or confirmation thereof, was sought or obtained from the probate court. The cotton crop failed, and early in 1925 further discussion of security for the loan of $4,000 from the minor's estate was had, and it was concluded, again with the consent and approval of the petitioner, that a second mortgage on the Whitley building in Corcoran, occupying lots 9, 10, 11, and 12 in block 31 of that city, owned by the Mayer Investment Company, be executed as security. The property was deemed to have a market value of about $30,000, on which there was a prior recorded incumbrance of $22,600, to which the mortgage to secure the $4,000 loan, executed on February 1, 1925, by Mildred M. Sutliff as president and Jay Mayer as secretary, and delivered to Mildred M. Sutliff as guardian, was made subject. It was in evidence that, when asked by the guardian whether the mortgage should be recorded, the petitioner replied that it would not be necessary, as the only persons who could sign a deed to the property were herself and her brother. The mortgage was never acknowledged nor recorded, nor was any application ever made to the probate court to approve or confirm the loan and the taking of the second mortgage on the Whitley building as security.

Shortly subsequent to these events Mrs. Sutliff left Corcoran to reside in Chula Vista, Cal. She testified that at that time she effected the election of her brother, Jay Mayer, as president, and her uncle, C. N. Hayes, as secretary of the company, so that the affairs of the company could still be carried on in her absence by members of the family. Although Mrs. Sutliff remained a director of the corporation, she ceased to attend directors' meetings.

In the meantime, the affairs of the corporation were becoming more embarrassed financially, and creditors were pressing for payment of their demands. On May 31, 1927, the petitioner mailed from Los Angeles to Jay Mayer at Corcoran a letter in which, among other things, he wrote: "I find that the by-laws of the corporation provide for a regular meeting of the board of directors to be held the first Wednesday of each month. As this comes tomorrow, I have made up the minutes of a meeting and a resolution authorizing the deed of the Whitley building. I have also prepared and am enclosing the deed. As soon as this is done you may file this letter as my personal undertaking to see that Jimmy gets his money in full. I think this action is imperative as I feel sure the National City Bank are preparing an immediate attachment of everything in sight. I hope to stall them off 48 hours while we can get this through. * * * P. S. Return the deed for notarial signature here. Don't forget corporation seal. Record Jimmy's mtg."

The directorate of the company consisted of four members, two of which constituted a quorum. The minutes of the meeting written as held on June 1, 1927, at 10 o'clock a. m., at the company's office, which then was relocated at Los Angeles at the office of the petitioner, recite: "A regular meeting of the board of directors of the Mayer Investment Company was held at the company's office the 1st day of June, 1927, at the hour of 10 o'clock a. m. The following directors were present: Jay Mayer and Frazier McIntosh. C. N. Hayes, the secretary, being absent, R. H. Golish was, by unanimous resolution, appointed acting secretary.

"Upon motion duly made and carried, the following resolution was unanimously adopted:

"Whereas, this corporation is indebted to Frazier McIntosh in the sum of $5,000 upon an account stated for legal services incurred more than three years ago; and whereas, said account is now due; and whereas, Frazier McIntosh has agreed to accept a deed to lots 9, 10, 11 and 12, in block 31, of the city of Corcoran, as per map of the townsite of Corcoran, recorded in Book 1, page 85 of Maps, in the office of the county recorder of said county, in full satisfaction of said account and in full satisfaction of all other claims and demands which he has against this corporation; therefore, Be It Resolved, That this corporation, in consideration of the foregoing, execute its deed to the said lots to the said Frazier McIntosh, or his assigns."

R. H. Golish was the petitioner's secretary and stenographer. It was in evidence and es-established that Jay Mayer was in Corcoran on June 1, 1927. The deed which was executed pursuant to that resolution was prepared by the petitioner, was signed and acknowledged by Jay Mayer as president and R. H. Golish as acting secretary, and ran to and was delivered to H. H. Krauch, a friend of the petitioner, as grantee. The deed did not mention, nor was it drawn subject to, the $4,000 second mortgage. On June 3, 1927, H. H. Krauch, as the assignee of the petitioner, filed a complaint in the superior court in and for Los Angeles county on an account stated to recover from the Mayer Investment Company the sum of $4,000 alleged to be due to Frazier McIntosh for professional services, together with interest from the 1st day of May, 1924. An attachment in that action was levied on the Whitley building, and judgment by default was entered on July 13, 1927, for $4,896.78 and costs. In that action Krauch was represented by an attorney who was an office associate of the petitioner.

Subsequently the petitioner effected a grant of the Whitley building to Mrs. Harriette E. Wheeler, who was his client, in exchange for one hundred acres of incumbered ranch property in Riverside county. Title to the ranch property at the petitioner's request was taken in the name of E. E. Steuri. Shortly prior to the hearing before the local committee, the ranch property was conveyed to El Serita Land Corporation, a California corporation newly formed by the petitioner, and in which he expected to be the owner of practically all of the stock. Mrs. Harriette E. Wheeler remained the owner of the Whitley building until two days before her death, when, under a power of attorney from Mrs. Wheeler, the petitioner deeded the Whitley building to a Mrs. J. B. Kneeben. Mrs. Wheeler was an elderly woman who had been suffering from a paralytic stroke. She suffered an additional stroke about forty-eight hours before she died. The consideration for the conveyance from Mrs. Wheeler to Mrs. Kneeben was an undertaking on the part of the latter to pay to the former the sum of $1,000 per month during Mrs. Wheeler's lifetime, but not to exceed the period of one year. The sum of $1,000 was accordingly paid upon execution of the deed, and Mrs. Wheeler's death two days later terminated the obligation to make further payments. Subsequent to Mrs. Wheeler's death, the petitioner offered for probate the will of Mrs. Wheeler by which he was made the principal beneficiary of her estate.

The petitioner concedes that the security for the obligation of the $4,000 loan from the estate of James B. Mayer, Jr., is lost. He also concedes that the obligation is his own, and expresses his intention to pay it, although he states that he has not set aside any property to cover or secure payment of the amount due. The petitioner paid the interest on the amount of the obligation up to January, 1928, and admits that he then ceased making interest payments because of his financial inability to meet them.

We are at a loss to understand on what ground the petitioner could expect condonement at the hands of the State Bar or of this court for the results brought about by his own activities, viz., a loss of the minor's estate. The petitioner takes the position that, unless there was a motive or intent to defraud, he is entitled to remain in practice as a lawyer and officer of the courts of this state. He contends that his motive was to protect the minor's interest, which he states is evidenced by his request of May 31, 1927, that "Jimmy's" mortgage be recorded. It will be remembered that the mortgage at that time was unacknowledged, that the officers of the company had since been changed, and that the mortgage was in the possession of another than the recipient of the letter of May 31, 1927. We also have the petitioner's own statement before the local committee:

"I said to Mr. Krauch that we were endeavoring at that time to prevent the National City Bank getting in ahead of me. I felt I was entitled to my pay, and it was a deliberate move on my part to get in ahead of the other fellows.

"Mr. Owen: You were primarily interested in protecting yourself? A. No question about it. * * * I told them I would be willing to reconvey the property, if they would give me the money owing."

We cannot escape the conclusion that motive and intent to defraud the minor is evidenced by the petitioner's manipulations of the Whitley building transactions. He knew that the $4,000 of the minor was loaned without authority of court. He knew that the mortgage on the Whitley building, prepared by himself and securing the $4,000, had been executed and withheld from record at his suggestion. He knew that the deed prepared by him and conveying that building to Krauch, his dummy, was silent as to the unrecorded second mortgage of the minor. Admittedly the petitioner was bent upon a prior satisfaction of his own claim to the exclusion of the minor's interests. It must be held that his conduct discloses a deliberate attempt on his part to defeat the secured claim of the minor which he was bound, professionally and in good morals, to protect, and that the petitioner's machinations with reference to the transfer of title to the Whitley building to his own benefit involved a deliberate evil purpose, and resulted in acts of moral turpitude.

Evidence was introduced with relation to other matters complained of, but these matters it is not necessary herein to discuss in detail. It may be said that, if no other than the latter matters were involved, the record would not justify a judgment of disbarment. But it is apparent from the record that the recommendation of the board was not based on those matters, but primarily was the outcome of the events and activities herein narrated. According to the petitioner every favorable inference and intendment, we must conclude that he has not met the burden imposed upon him by section 26 of the State Bar Act of showing wherein the decision of the board of governors is erroneous or unlawful.

It is ordered that the petitioner, Frazier McIntosh, be, and he is hereby, disbarred from the further practice of the law in this state as an attorney, and that his name be stricken from the roll of attorneys at law of the state of California.

POSTAL TELEGRAPH CABLE CO. v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION et al.*

L. A. 12455.

Supreme Court of California.
Dec. 27, 1930.

Rehearing Granted Jan. 26, 1931.

1. Master and servant ☞385(1).

Ability of workman to do exact work for which he had been employed is not the sole measure of disability under Compensation Act (St. 1917, p. 831, and amendments thereto).

2. Master and servant ☞385(17).

Employer held not entitled to credit against award of compensation for wages earned by employee subsequent to injury, which eventually left employee totally disabled (St. 1917, p. 839, § 9(b), as amended by St. 1919, p. 914, § 4).

Credit was not allowable, since the payments made to the employee subsequent to his injury and for which the employer sought credit as against the award of compensation were not intended nor accepted as disability compensation or gratuities, but represented wages for services performed.

3. Master and servant ☞385(1, 16), 386(1).

"Compensation," as used in statute, includes liability payments, medical and hospital treatment, and death benefit (St. 1917, p. 839, § 9(a)-(c), as amended by St. 1919, p. 914, § 4).

"Compensation," as used in the act, has been held to be a comprehensive term, including not only liability payments provided for in Workmen's Compensation Insurance and Safety Act (St. 1917, p. 839, § 9(b), as amended by St. 1919, p. 914, § 4), but also medical and hospital treatment provided for in section 9(a), as well as death benefits provided for in section 9(c).

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Compensation," see Words and Phrases.]

4. Master and servant ☞416.

Industrial Commission could not amend award to provide for future medical and hospital treatment of injured employee after expiration of 245 weeks after injury (St. 1917, p. 850, § 20(d)).

Proceedings under the Workmen's Compensation Law by Jack J. Coen an incompetent minor, employee, by Henry Coen, his guardian ad litem and trustee, opposed by the Postal Telegraph Cable Company, employer. To review an order of the Industrial Accident Commission awarding compensation for injuries, the employer brings certiorari.

Award affirmed in part, and annulled in part.

John W. Carrigan, of Los Angeles, for respondent Jack J. Coen.

Edward O. Allen, of San Francisco, for respondent Industrial Accident Commission.

WASTE, C. J.

Jack J. Coen, a minor, suffered a fracture of the skull on July 16, 1924, while acting within the scope and course of his employment as a messenger for petitioner, the Postal Telegraph Cable Company. Three months later he returned to his employment, and continued therein until June 1, 1926, receiving full wages during all of this period. On the latter date he left the employ of petitioner and engaged in other work. Application for adjustment of claim against petitioner was filed April 29, 1927, and the respondent commission, after hearing, found that temporary total disability had been caused from July 16, 1924, the date of the injury, to September 21, 1924, and from April 28, 1927, continuing indefinitely thereafter. Based on this finding, an award of $8.55 a week was made in accordance with the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act (St. 1917, p. 831, and amendments thereto). Subsequently, and on March 7, 1929, pursuant to further petitions and hearings, the commission filed its amended findings and award, whereby it was determined, upon competent evidence, that the injury had resulted in the mental derangement of the applicant causing permanent disability, the percentage being 100. The applicant was awarded $20.83 a week for 240 weeks, beginning July 24, 1924, which was 8 days after the date of the accident, as required by section 9 (b) of the act, as amended by St. 1919, p. 914, § 4, and a pension thereafter at the rate of $12.82 a week for the remainder of his life. Credit was allowed for all payments theretofore made as disability compensation and attorney's fees, but was refused as to all payments of wages subsequent to the injury. The commission filed its second amended findings and award on June 28, 1929, the amendments relating only to attorney's fees and to provisions for further medical and hospital treatment.

The employer, being self-insured, seeks to have the award annulled and set aside, contending that credit should have been allowed to it for all wages paid to the applicant upon his return to work subsequent to the injury. Reference is made to section 21 of article 20 of the Constitution and to section 1 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, supra, wherein it is provided that: "A complete system of workmen's compensation includes adequate provisions * * * to the extent of relieving from the consequences of any injury or death incurred or sustained by workmen in the course of their employment." Petitioner asserts that this language precludes the employee "from the benefit of an award for 240 weeks following July 24, 1924, as during such period was included a period from September 22d, 1924, until April of 1927, during which no consequences of the injury were sustained by the respondent Coen." Concisely stated, the question confronting us is this: Is an employer entitled to credit against an award of compensation for wages earned by and paid to an employee subsequent to an industrial accident, which accident eventually leaves the employee permanently and totally disabled?

Section 9(b) of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act provides that an injury to the brain resulting in incurable imbecility or insanity is conclusively presumed to be permanent and total in character for which the compensation shall be "sixty-five per cent of the average weekly earnings for a period of two hundred forty weeks and thereafter forty per cent of such weekly earnings during the remainder of life." The award in the present case was computed on this basis, and is, therefore, in strict accord with the letter of the statute.

[1] In our opinion it was not error for the respondent commission to refuse to credit the employer with payment of wages made to the employee for services performed subsequent to the date of the injury. These payments were not made as disability compensation and were not intended as gratuities, but represented money earned by the employee. Primarily, the question is, Has the workman's physical and mental efficiency been substantially impaired, and, if so, to what extent, and for what period of time will this impairment extend into the future? The statute is plain, and recovery is allowed for total disability because the employee is unfitted by his injury to follow any occupation. In Burbage v. Lee, 87 N. J. Law, 36, 93 A. 859, it is held that "the term 'disability' is not restricted to such disability as impairs present earning power at the particular occupation, but embraces any loss of physical function which detracts from the former efficiency of the body or its members in the ordinary pursuits of life." The injured employee in Case of Clark, 120 Me. 133, 113 A. 51, 52, lost the use of certain of his fingers by reason of an injury to the nerves of his arm, but he did not lose any time from his employment. The court there held: "Nor does the fact that there has been no loss of wages afford an answer to the application. By the injury to his hand, resulting in the permanent impairment of its usefulness the applicant has sustained a distinct loss of earning power in the near or not remote future." Some of the decisions go farther. The following appears in Williams v. Industrial Comm., 303 Ill. 352, 135 N. E. 758, 759: "While the evidence shows that Paluch at the time of the hearing was earning more than he was earning at the time he was injured, it does not follow, as a proposition of law, that his capacity to earn has not been reduced. The statute does not require that there shall be a showing of loss of earning power before compensation can be made for a disfigurement, and we are not authorized to read such a provision into the statute." The ability of the workman to do the exact work for which he had been employed is not the sole measure of disability. Frankfort General Ins. Co. v. Pillsbury, 173 Cal. 56, 58, 159 P. 150. See, also, Harvey v. Eldridge, etc., Co., 128 Kan. 403, 278 P. 16, 17. The United States Supreme Court in New York, etc., Ry. Co. v. Bianc, 250 U. S. 596, 602, 40 S. Ct. 44, 46, 63 L. Ed. 1161, held it could not "concede that impairment of earning power is the sole ground upon which compulsory compensation to injured workmen legitimately may be based. * * * And we see no constitutional reason why a state may not, in ascertaining the amount of such compensation in particular cases, take into consideration any substantial physical impairment attributable to the injury, whether it immediately affects earning capacity or not."

In the case of Mercury Aviation Co. v. Ind. Acc. Comm., 186 Cal. 375, 377-379, 199 P. 508, the employee involved had been paid his regular wage for a period of time subsequent to his injury. Following his discharge by the employer, he filed an application for adjustment of claim, and the employer claimed credit for the payments made. It was claimed that as the employee did not in fact earn the full weekly payments received by him after the impairment to his arm, such sums, or at least some considerable portion thereof, were not paid in return for labor, but should be regarded as payments of compensation due under the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act. The court said: "An employer cannot escape the payment of compensation for a permanent partial disability solely upon the ground that the employee returned to work prior to the termination of the period covered by the payments and for the same wages received by him before the injury." After discussing subdivision g of section 11 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, the opinion continues:

"Under the provisions of section 11, subd. 'g', * * * where payments have been made by the employer during the period of incapacity without any agreement between the parties as to the application of the same, the Commission may take the voluntary payments into consideration to the extent that it sees fit in fixing the amount of compensation, but the employer cannot complain if the Commission declines to make deductions on account of such payments. In the instant case it is admitted that there was no express agreement that the payments were made in discharge of any legal liability of the employer. * * * Inasmuch as petitioner chose to continue full payments during the period of total disability in the absence of any agreement, and thereafter to accept services from the employee and make regular payments to him without any understanding that the services rendered were not worth the sums paid and that some portion thereof was paid as compensation, it is not entitled, as a matter of legal right, to insist upon the deduction of the payments from the amount of the award. * * *

"The extent to which the payments should be considered, if at all, was entirely in the discretion of the Commission. It was logical for the Commission to deduct the amount of compensation payable during the period of total disability to offset the payments made by the employer when it received no return whatever from the employee. There was no abuse of discretion in the refusal of the Commission to credit the employer with the amount by which payments actually made during the period of total disability exceeded the payments called for by the act, nor in refusing to make any allowance for payments made after the employee returned to work."

In the case of De Zeng Standard Co. v. Pressey, 86 N. J. Law, 469, 92 A. 278, 279; Id., 88 N. J. Law, 382, 96 A. 1102, the principal question argued was whether the petitioner should receive an award for the permanent impairment of the function of his right arm, when it was shown that he had been earning the same pay as he had earned before the accident. The opinion states, in part: "Next it is argued that, because the petitioner worked for the prosecutor for 55 weeks at full wages, these 55 weeks should be deducted from the 60 weeks for which the award was made. The answer is that the prosecutor was under no obligation to employ the petitioner at $20 a week or any other sum, and that inasmuch as he chose to do so without any understanding, express or implied, that petitioner was not worth those wages, or that part of them should be treated as moneys paid under the compensation act, he must be presumed to have paid the money as wages and because he thought the petitioner was worth that amount. Indeed, it was optional to petitioner to continue working for the prosecutor, just as it was optional with the prosecutor to employ him, and, if the petitioner had chosen to do no work, he would have been entitled to his compensation under the act just the same. We see no force whatever in this argument."

[2] We are of the view that it definitely appears from these cases, which indicate the trend of judicial decision, that the right to compensation is not lost or diminished by the injured employee's return to work at the same or a different wage than that theretofore earned by him. The statute does not require a showing of loss of earning power as a prerequisite to the payment of compensation for a permanent disability, but, on the contrary, provides for the payment in installments of a fixed and definite sum of money therefor. As stated in the early part of this opinion, mental derangement resulting from an industrial accident is conclusively presumed by section 9(b) of the act to be permanent and total in character, for which the definite rate of compensation prescribed was properly applied by the Commission. The payments made to the employee subsequent to his injury, and for which the employer now seeks credit as against the award of compensation, were not intended nor accepted as disability compensation or gratuities, but represented wages for services performed. The authority of the commission to refuse to allow credit therefor is beyond question.

Petitioner attempts to distinguish the present case from the decisions above referred to on the ground that in each of the cited cases there was present immediately following the date of the injury, and at all times thereafter, including the subsequent period of employment, a total permanent disability of some kind or nature, for which the award was later made. We cannot conceive of a more severe permanent disability than that resulting from a mental derangement which entirely unfits the person to follow the ordinary pursuits of life. The impairment of one's mental faculties certainly results in as great a detriment to the individual as the loss of feet or arms or fingers, even though the mental derangement does not follow immediately upon the happening of the accident.

[3, 4] By its second amended findings and award, the Commission, on June 28, 1929, made provision for such further medical and hospital treatment as the employee might reasonably need from time to time to relieve him from the effects of the injury. Petitioner contends that this amendment was made more than 245 weeks after the date of the injury and is, therefore, in violation of section 20(d) of the act (St. 1917, p. 850). With this contention we must agree. As we compute it, this second purported amendment of the award was made 258 weeks and 2 days subsequent to the date of the injury. Section 20(d), supra, provides, in part, that "no award of compensation shall be rescinded, altered or amended after two hundred forty-five weeks from the date of the injury." The word "compensation," as used in the act, has been held to be a comprehensive term, including not only liability payments provided for in section 9(b) of the act, but also medical and hospital treatment provided for in section 9(a), as well as death benefits provided for in section 9(c).

United States Fidelity, etc., Co. v. Department of Ind. Relations, 207 Cal. 144, 153, 277 P. 492. Awards or amendments of awards providing for future medical and hospital treatment of injured workmen must, therefore, in order to be effective, be made within the period prescribed by section 20(d). Of course, as held in the case last cited, the commission has authority beyond this period to enforce an award for medical treatment which has been timely made, but that is not this case. Here an attempt has been made to amend an award to provide for future medical and hospital treatment after the time, within which such an amendment might be made, has expired.

The award is affirmed, except as to the purported amendment of June 28, 1929, which amendment was without the jurisdiction of the commission to make, and is hereby annulled.

Amendment relieving subcontractor and materialman of necessity of filing claims before commencing suit held applicable to contractor's bond executed prior thereto (St. 1919, p. 487, as amended by St. 1925, p. 539, § 2).

When the contractor's bond was executed, St. 1919, p. 487, required filing of verified statement of claim before action could be commenced on bond, but St. 1925, p. 539, § 2, providing that filing of such claims should no longer be condition precedent to commencing of action, was applicable to bond executed prior thereto, since in no way impairing obligation assumed by defendant in bond, but merely effected a change in procedure whereby remedy might be secured.

HOLLZER, Justice pro tem.

The above-entitled actions were tried together, and the appeals taken from the respective judgments entered therein are presented upon one and the same record. There is no real dispute as to the facts out of which the suits arose.

In March, 1925, one Callahan, as contractor, entered into an agreement with the Los Angeles city school district for the construction of two school buildings, and in connection therewith furnished a bond executed by the defendant, as surety, conditioned for the payment by the said contractor of all materials, etc., used upon said buildings. Said bond recited in part: "If said principal as contractor * * * fails to pay for any material * * * said surety will pay the sum * * * provided that a verified claim or claims shall be filed as required by an act of the Legislature of the State of California entitled, 'An Act to secure the payment of the claims of persons employed by contractors upon public works, * * *' approved May 10, 1919."

At the time said bond was executed, the act (St. 1919, p. 487) referred to therein required that, before an action could be commenced on the bond, the claimant, within the period allowed by law to file claims of mechanics' liens, must file with the official body by whom the contract had been awarded a verified statement of his claim showing that the sum due had not been paid.

After the execution of said bond, said act was amended so as to provide that the filing of such a claim should no longer be a condition precedent to commencing an action on the bond; said act becoming effective July 23, 1925 (St. 1925, p. 539, § 2).

Between April 22 and July 14, 1925, Simons Brick Company, one of the appellants herein, furnished brick which was used on one of the school buildings, and between May 1 and July 21, 1925, furnished brick which was used on the other building, on account of which material a balance of $2,392.33 still remains owing to said company.

On August 26, 1925, R. G. Blessing, the other appellant herein, completed his subcontract for the construction of a tile roof on one of said buildings, on account of which a balance of $375 still remains owing to him.

On October 14, 1925, notice of completion respecting one of said buildings was recorded, and on October 30, 1925, notice of completion of the other building was recorded.

Neither of the appellants herein filed a statement of its or his respective claim with the Los Angeles city school district.

It is conceded that, if the amendment which became effective July 23, 1925, is applicable to the claims upon which these actions are being prosecuted, the appellants are entitled to judgments for the respective amounts above mentioned. The trial court, however, held that said amendment was not retroactive, and rendered judgment in favor of the defendant.

Appellants contend that the amendment of July 23, 1925, in no way impaired the obligation which defendant assumed under the bond, but merely changed the procedure whereby those entitled to the remedy afforded by the act requiring such bond might obtain such remedy. Accordingly, it is argued, since the amendment became effective before the expiration of the period within which, under the prior law, they might have been required to file a claim with the official body which had awarded the contract—indeed, the time for filing such claim had not commenced to run as to appellant Blessing on the date the amendment went into effect—the provision under the prior law requiring the filing of such claims did not apply to the claims of the appellants, and hence they are entitled to recover on the bond.

The respondent, on the other hand, insists that the law, as it stood at the time the bond was executed, including the provision requiring the filing of the claim with the public body which awarded the contract, constituted a part of the obligation of such bond; that legislation relieving a claimant from such requirement with respect to any bond given prior to the enactment of such legislation would result in impairing the obligation of the bond, and hence would be unconstitutional. Respondent therefore contends that the failure of the appellants to file a verified statement of claim, as required by the statute at the time the bond was given, bars any right of recovery herein.

An examination of the authorities convinces us that the contention of the appellant must be upheld.

In Asbestos, etc., v. American Bonding Company, 25 Cal. App. 641, 145 P. 107, a bond was given pursuant to a statute enacted in 1897 (St. 1897, p. 202) requiring that the person seeking relief under the bond shall file with the board of public works a verified statement of his claim within 30 days from the time such work is completed, and providing further that suit may be filed by such claimant within 90 days after the filing of such claim. The work involved in that suit had been completed prior to February 26, 1912, but the claim was not filed until April 12, 1912, and the action was commenced July 18, 1912. However, the statute in force at the time of the execution of the bond was subsequently, to wit, in 1911, amended so as to extend the respective periods for the filing of claims and the commencement of suit thereon, and it was conceded that, if the act of 1911 was operative in that case, the claim was filed, and likewise the suit was commenced within the proper time.

In the cited case, the bonding company, as here, insisted that the amendatory act should not be construed as being retroactive, and that the provisions of the act in force when the bond was executed should be considered the sole criterion.

The court, however, overruled the contention of the bonding company, upon the theory that a change in remedy, or the time within which it must be sought, does not impair the obligation of a contract, provided an adequate and available remedy be left, and that the amendment in question involved merely a change of that character, citing in support of its conclusion the cases of National Surety Co. v. Architectural Decorating Co., 226 U. S. 276, 33 S. Ct. 17, 18, 57 L. Ed. 221; Bear Lake v. Garland, 164 U. S. 1, 17 S. Ct. 7, 41 L. Ed.

The first case cited was an action upon a bond given to a school district of Minnesota, conditioned that the general contractor would pay all claims for work, etc., furnished for the completion of a certain school building. On the date when the bond was executed, the law of Minnesota (Rev. Laws 1905, § 4539) provided that: "No action shall be maintained on any such bond unless within ninety days after performing the last item of work, or furnishing the last item of * * * material, the plaintiff shall serve upon the principal and his sureties a written notice specifying the nature and amount of his claim * * * nor unless the action is begun within one year after the cause of action accrues."

On April 22, 1909 (Laws 1909, c. 413), this provision was amended so as to require the notice of claim to be given within 90 days "after the completion of the contract and acceptance of the building by the proper public authorities," and was further amended by requiring the action to be begun within one year "after the service of such notice."

Plaintiff in that case performed services and furnished materials for use in the construction of said building during July and August, 1909. He gave notice of his claim in time to comply with the amended act, but not in time to comply with the law as it stood at the time the bond was executed.

The Supreme Court of Minnesota (115 Minn. 382, 132 N. W. 289) sustained the right of the plaintiff to recover on the bond, and overruled the contention of the surety company to the effect that the statute, if made applicable to the plaintiff's claim, impaired the obligation of the contract contained in the bond, and was therefore unconstitutional.

In affirming the decision of the Minnesota court, Mr. Justice Pitney, delivering the opinion for the United States Supreme Court, said in part:

"The argument for plaintiff in error is to the effect that since the right of action by a third party upon such a bond is of statutory origin, and since the statute in force at the time the bond in suit was given required a preliminary notice given to the obligors within a certain time, which notice (under Grant v. Berrisford [94 Minn. 45, 101 N. W. 940, 1133]) constituted a condition precedent to the action as much as if it had been set out as a proviso in the bond, a subsequent act of legislation dispensing with such notice, or changing the time within which it was required to be given, impairs the validity of the contract within the meaning of § 10 of art. 1 of the Constitution. * * *

"Nevertheless, granting, for the sake of the argument, the contention of the plaintiff in error that the contract in suit, so far as pertains to its obligation, is of statutory origin, it by no means follows that the provision respecting a preliminary notice to the obligors, as a condition precedent to suit thereon, although contained in the law as it stood at the time the bond was given, cannot be constitutionally modified by subsequent legislation. The decision must turn, we think, upon the familiar distinction between a law which enlarges, abridges, or modifies the obligation of a contract, and a law which merely modifies the remedy, by changing the time or the method in which the remedy shall be pursued, without substantial interference with the obligation of the contract itself.

"As Chief Justice Marshall observed in Odgen v. Saunders, 12 Wheat. 213, 349, 6 L. Ed. 606, 653, the obligation and the remedy originate at different times: 'The obligation to perform is coeval with the undertaking to perform; it originates with the contract itself, and operates anterior to the time of performance. The remedy acts upon a broken contract, and enforces a pre-existing obligation.'

"The distinction was well expressed by Mr. Justice Harlan, speaking for this court, as follows: 'It is well settled that while, in a general sense, the laws in force at the time a contract is made enter into its obligation, parties have no vested right in the particular remedies or modes of procedure then existing. It is true the legislature may not withdraw all remedies, and thus in effect destroy the contract; nor may it impose such new restrictions or conditions as would materially delay or embarrass enforcement of rights under the contract, according to the usual course of justice as established when the contract was made. Neither could be done without impairing the obligation of the contract. But it is equally well settled that the legislature may modify or change existing remedies, or prescribe new modes of procedure, without impairing the obligation of contracts, provided a substantial or efficacious remedy remains or is given, by means of which a party can enforce his rights under the contract.' Oshkosh Waterworks Co. v. Oshkosh, 187 U. S. 437, 439, 47 L. Ed. 249, 250, 23 S. Ct. 234, citing many previous cases. * * *

"In the case now before us, we agree with the Minnesota supreme court in the view that the requirement of a preliminary notice to the obligors as a condition precedent to an action upon the bond affects the remedy, and not the substantive agreement, of the parties. And although the statute as it stood when the bond was given (Rev. Laws 1905, § 4539) must, under Grant v. Berrisford, be treated as if written into the contract, it still imposed a condition not upon the obligation, but only upon the remedy for breach of the obligation. Therefore, the subsequent statute (Gen. Laws 1909, chap. 413) effected merely a change in the remedy, without substantial modification of the obligation of the contract."

In Colma Vegetable Ass'n v. Bonetti, 91 Cal. App. 103, 267 P. 172, the plaintiff, a co-operative marketing association, instituted suit to recover liquidated damages against the defendant, one of its members, and for specific performance of, and injunctive relief upon, a contract entered into between the parties. The plaintiff association was organized under a statute known as the Co-operative Marketing Act (St. 1921, p. 460). After the contract upon which said action was based had been entered into, said act was amended (St. 1923, c. 103, p. 222) so as to authorize recovery of liquidated damages specified in any contract made between such association and any member thereof, and said amendment further empowered the courts to direct specific performance of said contracts and to enjoin the breach thereof.

In affirming a judgment of the trial court awarding the relief authorized by this amendment, the District Court of Appeal, in course of its opinion, declared at page 112 of 91 Cal. App., 267 P. 172, 176:

"It is the contention of the appellant that the legislation above named increased the liability of the defendants under their contract. Remedial statutes which are retrospective in character do not impair contracts or interfere with fixed liability. They are not unconstitutional and the legislature may from time to time change or modify the remedy provided. In so doing it does not affect any vested right. It may be generally said that when the defendant signed the agreement which is here sued upon he obligated himself to deliver all his agricultural products to the plaintiff when he fails to do that he commits a legal wrong and thereby submits himself to the remedies provided by law.

"Cooley's Constitutional Limitations (7th Ed.) p. 515: 'As a general rule, every state has complete control over the remedies which it offers to suitors in its courts. * * * It may give a new and additional remedy for a right or equity already in existence. And it may abolish old remedies and substitute new; or even without substituting any, if a reasonable remedy still remains.'

"In the case of Aikins v. Kingsbury, 110 Cal. 674, 679, 680, 151 P. 147, 148, the Supreme Court of this state says: 'The passage of an act providing a new remedy for the state as a contracting party does not necessarily deprive the other party to the contract of his rights. * * * A remedy may be given where none existed before and it follows that a new and more liberal remedy may be substituted for one which was in effect at the time the contract of sale was made. * * * In the proposition often stated in the decisions that parties contract with reference to existing laws, and that such laws become a part of the contract, the reference is to those laws which determine and fix the obligation of the contract, the correlative rights and duties springing from it and not to laws of mere procedure prescribing remedies. With reference to these, there is ordinarily no obligation arising, but the contract is made in contemplation of the power of the Legislature to change them. Of course, all remedy cannot be taken away, nor can the existing remedy be so altered as to take away or impair any of the rights given by the contract as interpreted by existing law.' * * *

"The distinction between the obligation of a contract and a remedy given by the Legislature to enforce that obligation exists in the nature of things, and without impairing the obligation of the contract, the remedy may certainly be modified as the wisdom of the nation may direct."

"In the case of Brown v. Staple Cotton Co-operative Ass'n, 132 Miss. 859, 96 So. 849, the court says:

"It is true that said Co-operative Marketing Act, having been adopted after the contract here considered was entered into, does not and could not undertake to control the substantive rights of the parties to this cause. It is not true, however, that the remedies therein provided are not applicable to past as well as future transactions. It is too well settled to merit discussion that a remedy afforded by a statute passed subsequent to the date of the contract in question may be invoked by a party to the contract who has been wronged by its nonperformance. Such legislation does not impair the obligation of a contract. The obligation of a contract has reference alone to the rights of the parties arising thereunder and not to any remedy for their enforcement. A law creating a remedy applies to prior as well as future contracts and is constitutional."

Again, as stated in the case of City of Los Angeles v. Oliver, 102 Cal. App. 299, 315, 283 P. 298, 305: "When a law only affects the remedy or procedure, 'all rights of action will be enforceable under the new procedure, without regard to whether they accrued before or after such change in the law and without regard to whether the suit had been instituted or not, unless there is a saving clause as to existing litigation.' People ex rel. Foote v. Clark, 283 Ill. 221, 119 N. E. 329."

Applying the views expressed in the foregoing decisions, we conclude that the amendment of July 23, 1925, in no way impaired the obligation assumed by the defendant in its bond that said act merely effected a change in the procedure whereby the remedy afforded under the law, as it existed at the time the bond was executed, might be secured, and hence relieved the appellants of the necessity of filing any claim with the Los Angeles city school district as a condition precedent to commencing suit on the bond.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgments entered in these actions are reversed, and the trial court is directed to enter judgments in favor of the respective plaintiffs as prayed for in the respective complaints, with attorney fees in a sum to be fixed by the court.

ARCHBALD, Justice pro tem.

This is an appeal from a judgment of the superior court reversing a judgment of the municipal court of the city of Los Angeles and ordering a new trial.

Appellants brought suit in the municipal court against respondents for the sum of $883.50 and interest on the purchase price of a gasoline service station claimed to have been sold by plaintiffs to the defendants. The municipal court awarded plaintiffs judgment in the sum of $848.50, which judgment was appealed to the superior court and reversed on the ground of insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict and a new trial ordered. Defendants submitted as a part of their statement on appeal the complaint and a transcript of the testimony taken on the trial, which statement on appeal was filed in the superior court July 12, 1927, together with a transcript of the docket in the municipal court and the notice of appeal, which recites that it is taken on questions of law. Thereafter, and on August 2, 1927, an affidavit was filed in the superior court by defendants with the request that an order issue to the clerk of the municipal court directing such officer to transmit certain exhibits mentioned therein which were introduced in evidence at the trial, and an order was made pursuant thereto, as a result of which certified copies of all such exhibits were made and transmitted to the clerk of the superior court and appear in the record before us. The statement on appeal refers to the answer as being a part of it, but the record shows that a certified copy of such answer was filed in the superior court August 16, 1927. It is contended by appellant that the superior court erred in ordering such certified copies of the exhibits, as well as the answer, to be filed.

[1, 2] The appeal in this case was filed with the clerk of the municipal court June 3, 1927. On July 29, 1927, section 988b of the Code of Civil Procedure became effective, which reads in part as follows: "If it appear that there is any paper or record in the custody of the clerk of the municipal court which was before said court but which is not included in the record on appeal, and that an examination of such paper or record will assist in the determination of the appeal on its merits, the superior court may, on motion of either party, or on its own motion, require the production of a certified copy of such paper or record, and the same shall thereupon be deemed a part of the record on appeal." Such amendment affords ample authority for the addition to the record of the papers objected to, but counsel urges that it is not applicable because it was not in existence at the time the appeal was taken and is not expressly declared to be retroactive. Such an amendment affecting procedure only and not substantial rights is applicable to actions pending when it becomes effective (Maguire v. Cunningham, 64 Cal. App. 536, 222 P. 838); and, as the amendment was in effect before the order was made, even though after notice of appeal filed, there was no error in making the order.

It was the contention of the plaintiff in the trial court that the service station in question, with the fixtures, equipment, stock in trade, good will, and leases, was sold and delivered to the defendants for the agreed price of $700 cash and the assumption and payment by the latter of balances of $148.50 and $35 due, respectively, on a gasoline pump and a cash register, all of which was unpaid. The defendants denied that they bought the property mentioned, and alleged that the plaintiffs represented to them that they owned the service station free and clear of incumbrances, except the unpaid balances on the pump and cash register; that they would arrange for the payment of such balances by the defendants in monthly installments, and would remain at the service station while the escrow was pending. The parties executed an escrow agreement into which defendants placed the $700 cash. The escrow agreement provided that plaintiffs were to place therein a notice of sale of the service station, together with a bill of sale of same and three assigned leases. The notice of sale was to be recorded immediately. It provided, in substance, that plaintiffs intended to sell to defendants the stock in trade, etc., of said service station, located at 4707 North Huntington drive, Los Angeles, "and that a transfer and assignment of the same will be made, and the purchase price will be paid on Friday, the 21st day of January, 1927," at the office of the escrow holder, and complied in other particulars with section 3440 of the Civil Code. The escrow agreement also provided that the bill of sale and assigned leases were to be held until Friday, January 21, 1927, at 10 o'clock a. m., at which time, unless bills of creditors had been filed in excess of the $700 deposited, they were to be delivered to the vendees, and also that, "in the event that the conditions of this escrow have not been complied with at the expiration of the time provided for herein, you are instructed to complete the same at the earliest date possible thereafter unless I shall have made a written demand upon you for the return of the money and instruments deposited by me." On the reverse side of such agreement, and made a part of it by reference, among other provisions was the following: "No rescission of this escrow or modification of its terms or any notice or demand shall be of any effect without joint consent in writing subscribed by the parties hereto and assented to by California Bank." After the time so fixed for the closing of the escrow, respondents made written demand on the escrow holder for the return of their papers and money; the demand stating that Edmunds and Ayers had not complied with the terms of the escrow agreement to be performed by them.

[3, 4] There is a conflict in the evidence so far as the alleged agreement of plaintiffs to remain at the service station while the escrow was pending is concerned, and also as to whether or not a lease executed by the appellants to one Hardy of a part of the ground covered by the leases to be assigned to respondents was in force and effect while the escrow was pending; also as to whether or not appellants were to arrange with the parties from whom the pump and cash register were being purchased for the payment of the balance in monthly installment payments. The judgment of the trial court as to each contention cannot be disturbed on appeal, for the reason that the appellate court might not have decided them the same way. The evidence shows, without conflict, both appellants so testifying, that at least two of the leases called for by the escrow agreement were not delivered to the escrow holder until after January 21, 1927, at 10 o'clock a. m., and after demand had been made for the return of their money by respondents.

Counsel for appellants urges, however, that, inasmuch as the plaintiffs and the escrow holder did not consent in writing to the rescission of the agreement between the parties as required by the provision of the escrow agreement above quoted, it became a complete contract upon the deposit in escrow of the required leases, and respondents were liable for the purchase price agreed upon. The two provisions of the escrow agreement, quoted above, do not seem to be in conflict. There was no rescission of the escrow under the paragraph relied upon by appellants. The escrow expired by its own provision. It is true that, in the absence of a demand by one or both of the parties for a return of the papers or money deposited, the escrow holder was authorized to complete the same even after the expiration date, but that authority was terminated by the demand made by respondents, the appellants not having at the time of such demand complied with the conditions to be performed by them. Under the circumstances of the case, the superior court did not err in reversing the judgment of the municipal court and in ordering a new trial of the case.

Judgment affirmed.

Plaintiff brought an action for money had and received seeking to recover the sum of $7,000 paid to defendants as a deposit on the purchase price of certain real property. Trial was had before the court sitting without a jury. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendants appeal.

The property involved consisted of a dwelling house in Beverly Hills owned by defendants. The purchase price was $68,100. Plaintiff paid to defendants a deposit of $7,000 and agreed to take the property subject to a mortgage of $17,000 and to pay the balance of $44,100 within ninety days after May 14, 1926. Thereafter plaintiff abandoned the contract and made no tender of the balance of the purchase price. While on a trip to Wisconsin during the ninety-day period plaintiff wrote two letters to defendants' real estate agent. In the first letter written July 15, 1926, she said: "Have decided not to complete deal on home at 906 Bedford Drive and have written Security Trust Co., to that effect. Prefer to lose the 7000 paid Mr. Lux and pass the deal. Find I cannot use house at present." Apparently in response to a letter from the agent, she again wrote on August 11, as follows: "No—my letter was final—I find it isn't sensible for me to buy a home without an elevator as the stair-climbing is too much for me. * * * I am sorry to lose $7000.00 but I can better afford to do that. * * * " Nothing further was done until plaintiff demanded the return of the $7,000 in January, 1927. Defendants refused to return the deposit and plaintiff brought this action.

Upon the trial plaintiff disclosed that she was claiming the return of the deposit on the theory of a failure of consideration. In support of this claim evidence was introduced showing that there were certain conditions and restrictions of record contained in a deed to one of defendants' predecessors in interest. These conditions and restrictions were similar to those frequently found on property in residence districts. Plaintiff frankly conceded that at the time of the transaction she did not give any consideration to the question of restrictions and in fact did not know that there were any restrictions on the property until after this action was filed. This was many months after she had abandoned the contract and after the ninety-day period had expired. It is equally frankly conceded by counsel for plaintiff that in attempting to recover the deposit money plaintiff "is standing on technical rights."

In order to determine the respective rights of the parties, we will proceed to a consideration of their agreement. Two instruments relating to this transaction were signed by the parties consisting of a deposit receipt dated May 14, 1926, and escrow instructions dated May 18, 1926. These instruments are of some length. The first covers three pages and the second covers nine pages of the transcript. Both provided for the payment of the purchase price in the manner above set forth. Each contained many terms not contained in the other. In the deposit receipt no reference was made to conditions and restrictions. It provided for the payment of the balance of the purchase price within ninety days "into escrow." The escrow instructions made no reference to the deposit receipt but provided, among other things, that the balance of the purchase money should be used to carry out the escrow provided instruments had been filed enabling the escrow holder to procure a guarantee of title showing title vested in plaintiff free of encumbrances except " * * * Conditions, restrictions, reservations, rights, rights of way and easements, now of record, if any. * * * "

[1, 2] It is the contention of appellants that these two instruments signed by the parties should be construed together, and so construed, the agreement of the parties was for the purchase of the property subject to conditions and restrictions of record. We believe this contention must be sustained. Civ. Code, § 1642. The general rule referred to is supported by an abundance of authority and is well summarized in 6 California Jurisprudence, 298, as follows: "As a general rule, when several papers concerning one subject matter are separately executed by the same parties, all are to be construed together as one contract. The intention of the parties is to be gathered from all the instruments, taken together, and the recitals in each may be explained or corrected by reference to any other. This rule is adopted as part of the statute law by the provisions of the Civil Code, § 1642. 'Several contracts relating to the same matters, between the same parties, and made as parts of substantially one transaction, are to be taken together.' The several contracts must be so construed as to give effect, as far as practicable, to every part of each instrument. This is true although two contracts are made at different times, providing the later is not intended to entirely supersede the first, but only modifies it in certain particulars. The two are to be construed as parts of one contract, the later superseding the earlier one wherever it is inconsistent therewith."

In an effort to defeat the effect of the exception in the escrow instructions relating to conditions and restrictions, respondent relies upon Zlozower v. Lindenbaum, 100 Cal. App. 766, 281 P. 102, and Morgan v. Dibble, 43 Cal. App. 116, 184 P. 704. The facts in those cases differ essentially from the facts in the present case and it is sufficient to point out that in neither of the cases were the escrow instructions signed by both parties during the time provided for the consummation of the sale.

[3, 4] It is further contended by appellants that the motion for nonsuit should have been granted even though the deposit receipt alone is construed as the agreement between the parties. We are of the opinion that this contention must likewise be sustained as respondent showed neither a tender nor excuse for her failure to tender the balance of the purchase price. The deposit receipt provided for the retention by appellants of the amount paid in the event of the failure of respondent to pay the balance, but even in the absence of such express provision it is well settled that the seller is entitled to retain the payments made prior to the unexcused default of the purchaser. Tuso v. Green, 194 Cal. 574, 229 P. 327; Glock v. Howard, 123 Cal. 1, 55 P. 713, 43 L. R. A. 199, 69 Am. St. Rep. 17; 25 Cal. Jur. 797. Respondent attempts to excuse her default on the ground that the conditions and restrictions constituted a defect in the title which could not be removed, citing Prentice v. Erskine, 164 Cal. 446, 129 P. 585, and Whelan v. Rossiter, 1 Cal. App. 701, 82 P. 1082. We find no evidence to sustain respondent's position. So far as the record discloses these conditions and restrictions might have been removed by quitclaim as was done in Berryman v. Hotel Savoy Co., 160 Cal. 559, 117 P. 677, 37 L. R. A. (N.S.) 5. Neither of the cases cited by respondent is in point. In Prentice v. Erskine, supra, the title was defective by reason of a perpetual right of way for a public road which defect, as pointed out by the court, could not be removed by purchase or any ordinary method of business negotiation. In Whelan v. Rossiter, supra, the seller, when called upon to remove the restrictions and incumbrances, stated that he could not do so. In the present case respondent simply changed her mind, abandoned her agreement, and made no tender of the balance of the purchase price. By reason of respondent's abandonment of the contract appellants were never called upon to perform and were never in default. Respondent's default was not excused by reason of the alleged defective title of appellants at the time the agreement was made and she was not entitled to recover back the deposit money. Backman v. Park, 157 Cal. 607, 108 P. 686, 137 Am. St. Rep. 153; Hanson v. Fox, 155 Cal. 106, 99 P. 489, 20 L. R. A. (N.S.) 338, 132 Am. St. Rep. 72; Joyce v. Shafer, 97 Cal. 335, 32 P. 320; Easton v. Montgomery, 90 Cal. 308, 27 P. 280, 25 Am. St. Rep. 123.

The judgment is reversed.

HUNTER et al. v. SANTA BARBARA COUNTY.
Civ. 4139.

District Court of Appeal, Third District,
California.

Dec. 29, 1930.

Rehearing Denied Jan. 28, 1931. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 19, 1931.

1. Appeal and error $\Rightarrow$ 544(1).

Appeal on judgment roll alone presents no question as to sufficiency of evidence to sustain judgment.

2. Highways $\Rightarrow$ 113(3).

Contract, if created by bid and advertisement for highway construction was void, where referring only to portion of road for which bonds were voted, leaving insufficient funds for balance of road.

Road to be constructed was specifically described in all proceedings leading up to bond election, which was for construction and improvement of particular road as a whole. Road specified in bond election notices constituted a single continuous highway, but board of supervisors advertised for bids for construction of two separate portions of road. Bid for improvement of portion of road was accepted, leaving balance of funds insufficient to construct remainder of road.

3. Highways $\Rightarrow$ 113(3).

Addition to contractor's bid for highway construction to save bank purchasing highway bonds from loss because of difference between par and market value of bonds vitiated bid and subsequent proceedings (Pol. Code, $\S$ 2765).

4. Highways $\Rightarrow$ 113(3).

Bids for public work should be free from fraud.

LUTTRELL, Justice pro tem.

Plaintiffs and appellants brought this action in the superior court of Santa Barbara county to recover the sum of $98,670.95 as damages for breach of contract. A trial was had resulting in a judgment for defendant and respondent. This appeal is from such judgment and is brought here upon the judgment roll alone.

The facts of the case, as found by the trial court, are as follows: Some time prior to January 5, 1920, a permanent road division known and designated as the Permanent Road Division of Lompoc had been regularly created covering a portion of Santa Barbara county. On January 5, 1920, a petition was presented to the board of supervisors of said county asking for the improvement of certain specified roads in said road division, and on February 2 of that year said board of supervisors, by proper resolution, ordered that an election be called and held in the district for the purpose of submitting to the electors thereof the question of the issuance and sale of bonds in the amount of \$400,000 for the purpose of raising money to carry on and complete the work of improving the roads so specified and described in said petition. The election, so called, was, after due notice given, held and resulted in favor of the bonds in the amount specified. The bonds so voted were to run from one to twenty-four years and were to bear $5\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. interest. On the day of calling the election the board of supervisors, by proper action, set aside from the general fund of the county, to be used in connection with the money so to be raised by such bond issue, in the making of said road improvements, the sum of \$100,000, and also set aside from the road district fund of District 4 of said county the sum of \$11,000 for the same purpose. The published and posted notices calling said bond election specifically stated that the money to be raised by such bond issue was to be used in the improvement of roads within said permanent road division located as follows: "Beginning at the junction of the county road with the right-of-way of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company at Lompoc Junction; thence running in an easterly direction along what is known as the westerly extension of Ocean avenue and the county road known as Ocean avenue to the west boundary line of the city of Lompoc and Ocean avenue through the city of Lompoc, and on easterly to the Robinson bridge across the Santa Ynez river; also the road running from Robinson bridge northwesterly to what is known as the Four Corners; also the road from the Four Corners running in a general easterly direction through Santa Rita and through Santa Rosa Rancho and through the lands known as the lands of the Danish-American Colony to where said road intersects the easterly line of said Permanent Road Division; also H street in the city of Lompoc from the center line of Walnut avenue to the center line of Cypress avenue." Said election notices then stated in detail just how said described roads were to be improved by specifying the materials to be used, thickness and width of pavement, methods of drainage, and other details, and referred the voters to the petitions, orders, plans, maps, detail sheets, estimates, and specifications on file in the office of the board of supervisors for a more particular description of the work to be done. In the plans and specifications adopted by the board for such road improvement the roads to be improved were divided into sections known respectively as sections 1, 2, 3, 4A1, 4A2, and 4B, said sections altogether comprising all of the roads described in the bond election notices. The said roads specified in the bond election notices, petition, and plans and specifications constitute, as found by the court, a single and continuous road or highway from the west to the east end of the district and are not separate, distinct, and indivisible roads, and the work of improving and constructing said roads as also found by the court, constituted a single and indivisible scheme or plan of road construction and improvement.

On or about August 1, 1921, the board of supervisors, notwithstanding the fact that the county treasurer of said county, with whom the bonds which had been voted by the district had been placed for sale, had been unable to sell any of same at par plus accrued interest, advertised for sealed bids for the construction and improvement of the roads described in the bond election notice and in the plans and specifications. In such advertisement the board asked for bids for the furnishing of necessary tools, machinery, labor, and material to complete all of said sections and roads described in the bond election notice, and also for alternative bids for the construction and improvement of each of two separate portions of said roads; the said separate portions being specified in the advertisement. The advertisement for bids contained the usual clause notifying prospective bidders that a bond for faithful performance of the contract would be required of the successful bidder and also that each bidder must accompany his bid with a certified check as a guarantee that the bidder, if successful, would enter into the contract and give the required bond. The right to reject any and all bids not deemed advantageous was reserved.

On or about August 22, 1921, which was within the time specified in the advertisement, plaintiffs filed with the clerk of the board of supervisors their three separate bids for the road construction and improvement, as called for in said advertisement, and accompanied each of said bids with the necessary certified check. In one of such bids or proposals, plaintiffs offered to construct and improve, according to the plans and specifications, that certain portion of the said roads described in the advertisement as sections 4B-4A2-4A1-3 and that portion of section 2 between the westerly town limits of Lompoc and the westerly end of section 3 for the sum of $485,380.55.

In another bid submitted they offered to do the required work covering section 4B-4A2-4A1-3-2 for the sum of $528,204.92, and in a third and separate bid they offered to construct and improve the entire road described in the notice and in the plans and specifications for the sum of $715,326.64. On August 22, 1921, the board of supervisors, at a regular meeting thereof, proceeded to open plaintiffs' said bids. There were no other bids submitted. Upon opening the bids, the board considered all of them excessive and upon motion duly made and carried, rejected all of them.

A motion was then made and seconded to reconsider the action of the board in rejecting said bids. A vote was taken upon this motion and resulted in a tie. The board then adjourned until 2 o'clock in the afternoon of the same day, and upon reconvening at said hour a motion was again made to reconsider the action of the board in rejecting plaintiffs' bids. This motion was thereupon carried, and the board then by a three to two vote decided to accept plaintiffs' bid to construct and improve the particular sections of the highway to be improved, designated as sections 4B-4A2-4A1-3 and that portion of section 2 lying between the westerly city limits of Lompoc and the westerly end of section 3, for said sum of $485,380.55, so bid for such work. This particular portion of the highway constituted about two-thirds of the entire project for which the bonds had been voted. Upon such vote being taken by the board accepting such bid the chairman of the board declared the motion to accept such bid carried and declared the contract awarded to plaintiffs on their said bid, upon their entering into a contract and giving bond for the fulfillment thereof, as provided by law. The aforesaid action of the board was duly entered in the minute book of the board, and the district attorney of the county prepared, in proper form, a written contract for execution, covering the said work. This contract was duly signed by plaintiffs, and they furnished the required bond; but the contract was never signed by the chairman and clerk of the board, nor by any one on behalf of the county. Neither was plaintiffs' bond ever approved. No other action was taken by the board upon either of the other two bids submitted by the plaintiffs.

At the time of this action of the board accepting plaintiffs' said bid for the construction and improvement of only a portion of the roads for which bonds had been voted, the total amount provided and set apart for the construction and improvement of all of the roads specified in the bond election notice was the sum of $511,000, being, as heretofore shown, the $111,000 appropriated by the board from the county and the road district funds, plus the $400,000 voted at the bond election. It is also a fact, as before stated, that when the action of the board accepting plaintiffs' bid was taken, as aforesaid, none of the bonds which had been voted by the electors of the road division had either been issued, or sold, for the reason that same were not salable at par plus accrued interest.

It is also true, as found by the trial court, that the amount left of the $511,000, provided for the construction and improvement of the entire road system in the road division specified and described in the bond election notice, after deducting the $485,380.55, the amount of plaintiffs' bid for the construction and improvement of the portion of the road specified therein, would be wholly insufficient to construct and improve the balance of said roads, for which said bonds had been voted.

It is a conceded fact in the case, and so found by the court, that before submitting their bids to the board of supervisors for doing said road work plaintiffs entered into an arrangement with the County National Bank of Santa Barbara, which bank was engaged in the banking business in such city, by which arrangement it was agreed between plaintiffs and such bank that plaintiffs would submit their bid or bids to the board of supervisors of said county for the construction and improvement of said roads of said permanent road division, or certain portions thereof, as called for in the advertisement for bids, and that in submitting such bid or bids, they would add to the amount thereof the sum of $60,000, which sum was estimated by plaintiffs and said bank to be the difference between the par value and the market value of said bonds, and that, in the event that plaintiffs' bid was accepted by the board and they secured the contract for doing said road work, said bank would purchase all of the said bonds of said permanent road division at the par value thereof, plus accrued interest, and that the $60,000, so to be added to plaintiffs' said bid or bids was for the purpose and was to be used to compensate said bank for the loss to be sustained by it in purchasing said bonds at their par value and reselling same at their market value. Under the aforesaid arrangement, as stated, the bank was only to purchase said bonds after and in the event that plaintiffs' bid for said road work should be accepted.

It is also a conceded fact, and so found by the trial court, that pursuant to such arrangement between plaintiffs and the bank, plaintiffs did file their said bid in the sum of $485,380.55, as hereinbefore mentioned, and that in figuring and estimating the said amount of such bid, they did add and make a part thereof, said sum of $60,000 for the purpose aforementioned.

The trial court found that at least three of the supervisors of the county, at the time of the opening of the bids of plaintiffs and the action thereon, as heretofore related, knew nothing of such aforesaid arrangement between the plaintiffs and the bank, and had no knowledge that the plaintiffs, in submitting their bid, had added to the amount thereof, said sum of $60,000 for the purpose of compensating the bank for loss sustained, as aforesaid. After plaintiffs' said bid was accepted by the board of supervisors, the bank, pursuant to its agreement with plaintiffs, purchased all of the said bonds of such road division, paying therefor $400,000, the par value thereof, plus accrued interest, and afterwards sold all of the said bonds for the sum of $346,000. The court further found that said bank would not have purchased said bonds, but for the aforesaid action of the board of supervisors in accepting plaintiffs' bid for such road construction work and but for its said agreement with plaintiffs to so add the $60,000 to their bid for said work, and with said sum so added, compensate it for its loss in so purchasing the bonds.

On September 6, 1921, the board of supervisors, at a regular meeting thereof and over the protest of plaintiffs, rescinded its previous action in accepting the said bid of plaintiffs and rejected plaintiffs' said bid. Santa Barbara county never tendered back to said bank nor to plaintiffs any part of said sum so paid by the bank to the county for said bonds, and the court found that plaintiffs have agreed to reimburse the bank for its said loss in the purchase and resale of said bonds and that plaintiffs are indebted to the bank in said amount.

After rejecting plaintiffs' said bid on September 6, 1921, the board of supervisors proceeded to advertise for bids for the construction of said roads as specified in the bond election notice, as an entirety, and on December 5, 1921, accepted a bid which had been submitted pursuant to such advertisement, by Fairchild, Gilmore & Wilton Company, for the construction of all of said roads so specified and described in the bond election notice, and awarded the contract therefor to said last mentioned company. Thereafter, on December 13, 1921, plaintiffs filed in proper form with the clerk of the board of supervisors their demand for their claimed damages for breach of contract in said sum for which this suit was brought. This demand was, on March 6, 1922, rejected by the board of supervisors and the present action followed. It was found by the trial court that upon plaintiffs' said bid being accepted by the board of supervisors on August 22, 1921, for the construction work therein described, plaintiffs filed the required bond and proceeded to procure certain equipment with which to do said work and have at all times been ready and willing to proceed with said construction work, but that said board of supervisors refused to proceed further in the matter of the acceptance of plaintiffs' bid and the awarding of the contract to them.

From the facts thus related and found by the trial court, the conclusion was there drawn that the roads described in the notice of bond election constituted one continuous, indivisible highway, and the work of constructing and improving said roads, so specified and described, constituted one indivisible scheme or plan of highway improvement, and that the board of supervisors was not authorized to advertise for bids for the construction and improvement of any part or portion of said roads, or for any work less than the work of constructing and improving said roads in their entirety, and had therefore no legal authority to accept plaintiffs' said bid for the construction and improvement of only a portion of said roads.

The further conclusion was drawn that the said bid of plaintiffs and the action taken thereon by the board did not constitute a contract for the construction and improvement of said roads, or any portion thereof. The trial court further concluded that the agreement entered into between the plaintiffs and the bank, as mentioned in the facts found in the case, was entered into for the purpose of evading the law which requires bonds of a permanent road division to be sold for not less than their par value and accrued interest, and that plaintiffs' said bid having been filed pursuant to such agreement was illegal and void, and the action of the board with reference to such bid, was illegal and unauthorized. As heretofore stated, the judgment of the trial court in defendant's favor followed.

[1] The appeal having been taken upon the judgment roll alone, of course, no question is presented as to the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the judgment.

In seeking a reversal of the judgment appellants rely upon three propositions: First, that a binding and enforceable contract arose between the plaintiffs and the county immediately upon the acceptance of their bid by the board of supervisors, even though the formal written contract, prepared by the district attorney, was never signed on behalf of the board. Secondly, that said alleged contract was not vitiated by the arrangement between the plaintiffs and the bank and the inclusion of the discount on the bonds in the amount of plaintiffs' bid. Thirdly, that said claimed contract is not invalid because of the fact that it was let for the construction of only a portion of the entire road project.

In meeting these contentions, and in support of the judgment, the respondent claims: First, that no binding and enforceable contract was ever entered into by and between the parties so as to give rise to an action for damages in favor of appellants. Secondly, that the board of supervisors of the defendant county lost jurisdiction to make a valid award to appellants by reason of the unrevoked finding that appellants' bids were excessive. Thirdly, that appellants by adding the amount of $60,000 to the amount of their bid for the work in question, to enable appellants to reimburse the bank (the purchaser of the bonds), for the loss to be sustained by said bank in reselling said bonds for less than the par value thereof, pursuant to an agreement therefor made prior to the filing of said bids and the purchase of said bonds, entered into a fraudulent conspiracy to evade the law with respect to the purchase of bonds for less than the par value plus accrued interest and that such bid so filed was therefore illegal and void. Fourthly, that the appellants' bid, purported to have been accepted by the board of supervisors, was one for only a portion of the work for which the bonds were voted and therefore illegal and void. Fifthly, that the county of Santa Barbara is not liable in damages for the actions of its board of supervisors when acting for a local improvement district.

It is self-evident that if counsel for respondent are correct in any one of these five contentions, the judgment in the case must be upheld.

In their briefs counsel on both sides have given much space to a discussion of the question as to whether or not the submission by appellants of their written bid in response to the advertisement of the board of supervisors, and its subsequent acceptance by the board and the minute entry thereof in the board's records, constituted a contract between the parties.

In the view we have taken of the case it matters not whether such acts constituted a contract between the parties, or whether, as claimed by respondent, a formal, written document signed and executed by both parties was necessary.

[2] Assuming that such acts of the parties did constitute a contract, we feel that same was illegal and void particularly by reason of the fact that it called for the construction and improvement of only a portion of the road for the construction and improvement of which the bonds had been voted, and left an amount of money in the fund wholly insufficient to construct and improve the balance of the road. The road to be constructed and improved having been specifically described in all of the proceedings leading up to the bond election, and particularly in the notice of the bond election itself, we believe that the taxpayers of the road division voted the bonds for the construction and improvement of that particular road as a whole, and not any particular part or portion thereof, and that when these bonds were so voted a status favoring of a contractual relationship at once arose between the voters on the one hand and the road division represented by the officers charged with the duty of carrying out the improvement for which the bonds were voted on the other, and that the contract, if such it may be called, which thus came into being, could not be altered by one party without the consent of the other. In this case, therefore, when the board of supervisors sought to do only a portion of the work with the funds which the voters had provided for the doing of the work in its entirety, said board exceeded its authority and violated this contractual relationship which had arisen. Obviously it was the intention of the electors of the road division in having same formed and in later voting the bonds to have the entire highway specifically described in all of the proceedings, constructed and improved in the particular manner specified, and not merely such portion of same as the board of supervisors might see fit to designate. The entire road was wanted by the electors, and nothing else, as they clearly signified in voting the bonds. It may well have been that had the voters known that the board of supervisors had the power, or would have used the bond money to construct and improve only two-thirds of the road involved, leaving the entire project incomplete and possibly ineffective, they would not have voted the bonds. The construction and improvement of only two-thirds of the road for which the bonds were voted might, and no doubt would have, deprived many of the taxpayers of the division of any, or of at least that benefit to which they were entitled as recompense for voting the bonds and paying their portion of the taxes necessary to redeem same. In other words, had the board of supervisors proceeded to construct and improve only the portion of the road specified in the accepted bid of plaintiffs, it might well have meant that only a portion of the division would have been benefited by the improvement, whereas the entire division would have been obligated to pay for same. Indeed, we can readily conceive of how the construction or improvement of only a portion of the road might entirely destroy the possibility of any benefit accruing therefrom to a large portion of the taxpayers of the division. Such action on the part of the officials would create an inequitable division of the benefits without a corresponding equalization of the burdens.

In reaching these conclusions in the premises, we earnestly feel that we are not only carrying out the letter, but the very spirit of the law governing such matters. We also believe that our conclusion is amply supported by the decisions in this state. To our minds a similar situation to the one in the instant case upon this point was involved in the well-considered case of O'Farrell v. County of Sonoma, 189 Cal. 343, 208 P. 117, 119. In that case the electors of Sonoma county, at a general bond election called by the board of supervisors, were called upon to vote on the question of issuing bonds of the county in a large sum of money for the purpose of building highways in the county. One of the highways included in the resolution of the board calling the bond election, and in the notice of the bond election, was described as follows:

"Sebastopol to Freestone.

"Beginning at a point in the present Sebastopol-Freestone Road 1.1 mile westerly from the limits of the Town of Sebastopol; said point at the end of the present oil road; thence along the present road to its intersection with the present Freestone-Valley-Ford Road.

"Distance 4.0 miles. $85,000.00."

Other highways proposed to be constructed were similarly designated and described. The bond election carried and the bonds were sold. When it came to the construction of this Sebastopol to Freestone highway, the highway engineer of the county prepared and submitted to the board plans and specifications and estimates calling for the construction of only a portion of the four miles of highway connecting the two towns. His plans covered 1.93 miles of said highway and his estimate of the cost of construction of such portion was $81,500, which would leave an insufficient amount out of the $85,000 voted to complete the said road. The board adopted the engineer's plans and specifications and proceeded to advertise for bids for the construction of said 1.93 miles of said highway. Bids were received and the board was about to let a contract when an injunction was sought to restrain such action. In seeking the injunction the plaintiff contended that under the facts as they existed the board could only ask for bids for the construction of the road from Sebastopol to Freestone as an entity, and that if the bids were too high the board could not proceed without further authority from the electors. The defendant contended that the board had a discretionary power to spend the entire $85,000 on any part or portion of the road, as such board might deem meet and proper.

In passing upon the point the Supreme Court said: "We think that 'discretionary powers' are a false issue in this case. When the defendant board was contemplating a bond issue on the 16th day of April, 1919, it had the statutory right to make its order just as broad, and just as narrow, and just as specific as it was willing to be bound by, so long as the provisions of the statute were complied with. At that time it could have asked generally for the consent of the electors to issue bonds in the sum of $1,640,000, for constructing roads in Sonoma county, but it did not do so; on the contrary, it specified road by road, name by name, and length by length, of each piece of road that was to be constructed. When, in the order, it specified Sebastopol to Freestone, four miles, designating the point of beginning and the point of the ending, any question of discretion as to division or subdivision into sections was, as to these elements, exercised once and for all and as a finality. When thereafter, pursuant to that order, the defendant board published a notice to the electors in exact accord with its order, every elector had the right to assume that the statement contained in the order to the effect that a road would be constructed from Sebastopol to Freestone meant the entire distance between those two points—not one end, or the other end, or any part or portion, but the whole." Continuing further on in the opinion the court used this language: "The electors must have also known that ordinarily a board of supervisors has many discretionary powers; but, nothing to the contrary appearing the electors had the right to assume that after the election the board of supervisors would call for bids for the construction of a road four miles in length between Sebastopol and Freestone as described in its order and costing not to exceed $85,000. The order calling the election and the ratification of that order by the electors constituted a contract between the state and the individuals whose property was thereby affected. Peery v. City of Los Angeles, 187 Cal. 753, 19 A. L. R. 1044, 203 P. 992. After the contract had been made, it could not be altered by one of the parties, only, but by all of the parties thereto. When by its order, duly accepted by the vote of the electors, the length of the road had been specifically defined, its terminals specifically located, and the cost of the whole established, these elements became a part of the contract. As to them the board, acting alone, could not redivide the contract. Neither could it directly expend the moneys on only a portion of the road. What it could not do directly it could not do indirectly. Such fact is of the utmost importance to the interested parties. It is the only hold the taxpayers have for specifically enforcing the contract as made by them. The very gist of the plaintiff's complaint is that the defendant board has not asked for, and has not obtained, a bid for constructing the whole road. For this reason the plaintiff may complain. If the defendant board has the statutory right to let contracts to build said road in sections, then, as the defendant argues, all of the funds may be spent on one mile in the discretion of the board. But the board may not let the contracts piecemeal. It has waived its right to do so."

We have thus quoted at length from the Sonoma County Case for the reason that the situation in that case seems so analogous to the one before us, the decision there seems controlling in the case here.

The principle involved is also supported in the following cases: Jenkins v. Williams, 14 Cal. App. 89, 111 P. 116; McMahon v. Board of Supervisors, 46 Cal. 214; Peery v. City of Los Angeles, 187 Cal. 753, 203 P. 992, 19 A. L. R. 1044; McBean v. Redick, 96 Cal. 191, 31 P. 7; Treanor v. Houghton, 103 Cal. 60, 36 P. 1081; Kutchin v. Engelbret, 129 Cal. 635, 62 P. 214.

Counsel for appellants contend that the O'Farrell v. County of Sonoma Case is not in point here, but that the late case of Williams v. City of Stockton, 195 Cal. 743, 235 P. 986, decided by the Supreme Court after judgment was rendered in the instant case, is decisive of the point under consideration. In making this contention they rely upon the similarity of the statutory provisions under which the action was taken by the board of supervisors in the case at bar and by the city council of the city of Stockton in the Williams Case and upon the claimed difference in the statutory provisions in our case and the Sonoma County Case. Appellants' counsel also assert that the cases of McBean v. Redick, Treanor v. Houghton and Kutchin v. Engelbret, supra, are not in point here for the reason that in those cases street improvement proceedings were involved and consequently the proceedings were in invitum, requiring a strict pursuance of all proceedings leading up to the levy and collection of the tax, whereas, the proceedings in the case before us are not in invitum for the reason that the bonds for the work to be done had already been voted by the taxpayers.

We have examined all of these cases and find ourselves unable to agree with the contentions of counsel for appellants. To our minds the marked distinction between the Williams v. City of Stockton Case and the Sonoma County Case and the one under consideration is that in the letting of the contracts for the construction and equipment of the city hall in Stockton involved in the former case, all taxpayers of such city who had provided the money for such improvement were treated exactly alike. The action of the city council did not result in an inequitable division of benefits and burdens. The taxpayers of the city were not by such action divided into two classes, one receiving the benefits of the improvement, while the other received none. As heretofore pointed out, just the contrary would have resulted in the Sonoma County Case had the action of the board in proposing to let a contract for a portion of the work only, been upheld, and will also result in the instant case unless the judgment rendered is upheld upon this point. We can see other marked differences between the Williams v. City of Stockton Case and the one before us, but deem it unnecessary to discuss them.

As to the claim of the appellant in the case at bar that the McBean, Treanor and Kutchin Cases above mentioned, are not in point, suffice it to say that we deem them important upon the general proposition of the contractual relationship which arose out of the proceedings taken, which question we have heretofore discussed in this opinion.

[3, 4] We feel that we could safely rest our decision in this case upon this single question of the authority of the board of supervisors to let a contract for one portion of the work only instead of for the work in its entirety, but deem it advisable to give at least a brief consideration to one other important question involved in the appeal; that of whether or not the adding of the $60,000 to their bid by the plaintiffs for the purpose of saving the bank (the purchaser of the bonds) from loss on account of the difference between the par and the market value of the bonds vitiated plaintiffs' bid and nullified all of the subsequent proceedings with reference thereto. We believe that it did and that upon this conceded fact alone the judgment in the case might well be affirmed. It would seem that in the interests of public policy, if nothing else, bids for public work should be honest and free from any taint or suspicion of fraud. The taxpayers in this instance who voted the bonds which became, when issued, a lien upon their land, certainly had a right to expect that such bonds would be legally sold at their par value, plus accrued interest, and that every single dollar thus received would be honestly expended in making the improvement for which the bonds were voted. It is self-evident that such would not have been done, had the scheme which was initiated been accomplished. Certainly $60,000 of the taxpayers' money would not have gone into road construction and improvement. Under the circumstances may it not well be concluded that plaintiffs' bid for the work was excessive, at least, to the extent of this $60,000 which the bidders themselves never intended should go into the actual road construction. The law required that these bonds be sold at not less than their par value, plus accrued interest. Pol. Code, § 2765. Did not the agreement entered into between the bidders and the bank result, and was it not designed to result, in a sale of the bonds at less than par? Did not this agreement result indirectly in accomplishing that which could not be accomplished directly? A similar situation was before the court of Civil Appeals of Texas in the case of Wilson v. Hebert, 174 S. W. 861, 863. The law of that state requires that the bonds involved be sold at not less than par and accrued interest. The court said: "If, then, a bidder, in view of the fact that the market value of the bonds is lower than the par value, places his bid at a sum higher than he would have done * * * so as to permit him to pay the difference, the effect is the same as if the bonds had been sold below par. * * * The result is that the taxpayer who must ultimately pay the bonds, instead of getting par value for the bonds in work, gets in work only the market value, which is less. This method is only the doing indirectly of that which the law positively forbids, and cannot be tolerated."

In the case of Ogg v. Dies (Tex. Civ. App. 176 S.W. 638, 640, the point was disposed of in the following strong language: "The statute forbids the sale of bonds of this character for less than par value and accrued interest; and, if a contractor bids for both the work and bonds, and the evidence justifies the conclusion that the bid for the work is not made upon a cash basis, but fixed at an amount sufficiently in excess for what the work could be procured to be done for cash to recoup the contractor for a portion of the amount which he agrees to pay for the bonds, such bids should not be accepted, because this method of selling the bonds is a clear evasion of the statute, which forbids their sale for less than part and accrued interest."

These, and other authorities which might be cited, seem decisive upon the point. When the plaintiffs and the bank entered into the arrangement under which the bank was not to purchase the bonds unless the plaintiffs secured the contract, and the plaintiffs were to add $60,000 to the amount of their bid solely for the purpose of insuring the bank against loss in the transaction, thus depriving the taxpayers of the road division of $60,000 worth of road construction and improvement, to which they were entitled under the bond issue and the appropriations made by the board of supervisors, surely a fraud upon such taxpayers was in the contemplation of plaintiffs and the bank, which fraud was only prevented by the timely action of the board in rejecting plaintiffs' bid on September 6, 1921. Appellants assert that such arrangement between the plaintiffs and the bank and the carrying out thereof did not vitiate the claimed contract for the reason that the board of supervisors had no knowledge of the inclusion of the $60,000 item in plaintiffs' bid and that proof of collusion between the plaintiffs and the bank on the one hand and the county authorities on the other is essential to make the transaction illegal. The further assertion is made that the practice indulged in here between the plaintiffs and the bank is a common one among contractors, and that a regular, systematized, and generally recognized method of financing construction programs will be invalidated if the instant case is decided against appellants on the question of the methods used to enable the bonds to be sold. With reference to the last assertion, sufficient it is to say that if the transaction is illegal, we have no concern with what effect this decision may have upon future contracting or the sale of bonds for public improvements. With the contention that proof of collusion on the part of the board of supervisors was essential to vitiate the transaction, we find ourselves, under the circumstances of this case, unable to agree for the reasons heretofore discussed. However, upon this point raised by the appellants, the express finding of the court that at least three of the supervisors of the county did not know of the arrangement between plaintiffs and the bank heretofore adverted to, or of the adding by plaintiffs of the $60,000 to their bid, at the time of the opening of the bid or the board's action thereon, is worthy of note. This finding naturally implies that the other members of the board did have such knowledge, which, if true, would according to appellants' own contention, as we understand it, nullify the whole transaction.

Believing that the judgment of the trial court must be sustained for the reasons herein given, we deem it unnecessary to further extend this opinion by a discussion of other questions involved in the appeal.

The judgment is affirmed.
